THE
CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE
A NEATLY PRINTED SIXTEEN PAGE WEEKLY JOURNAL, UNSECTARIAN AND OPPOSED TO SECRET SOCIETIES.

THE POLE STAR OF REFORM.

EVERY Christian, every Prohibitionist and every Patriot should read it for the following among other reasons:

1. Because it meets the wants of the general public by giving in brief the latest reliable information on all questions of Reform, having the special object of exposing and opposing organized secrecy. Besides able editorial, contributed and selected articles upon this topic, which is of more than national importance, it has interesting sketches of progress and incidents from the reform lecturers in all parts of the country, reform news and notes, letters from the Old World, etc., etc. It is the especial organ of this movement in America—a movement which is sustained by the utterances of some of the ablest statesmen and divines whom the country has produced. Every person interested in either the family, government, or religion—the most sacred interests of humanity—is directly affected by secret societies, and needs to keep posted in this movement.

2. Because it is uncompromising on ALL questions of the day. On temperance, tobacco, Sabbath desecration, Mormonism, the Southern and Indian questions, civil-service reform, monopolies, the rights of labor, and every other question, its only aim is to be RIGHT, and advocate the TRUTH. It is hence FEARLESS and OUTSPOKEN.

2. Because it emphasizes the fact that political action should be directed by conscience enlightened by the WORD and SPIRIT of God and that Christ must be acknowledged KING of NATIONS, and presents a platform epitomizing the science of civil governments based on the supreme authority of the DIVINE WORD.

4. Because, in addition to these features, it contains a choice selection of wholesome reading for the family, from oldest to youngest, with religious and secular news, market reports, etc.

It is now owned and published by the

THE INTER OCEAN.

IN 1885 THE INTER OCEAN enters upon the fourteenth year of its existence. Given unusual confidence by the people in its early days, it has steadily grown in favor until this day, when the publishers take pride in the fact that the paper goes into more homes and has a greater number of readers than any publication west of the Alleghenies.

From the beginning the INTER OCEAN has stood firmly by the principles of the Republican party, and has, in season and out of season, contended for "protection to American industry." It does not agree with the idea that the mission of the Republican party is finished; on the contrary, it believes that, purified by adversity, it will in the near future again rise to the higher planes of thought and action and be completely restored to the confidence of the American people. The most important agencies in accomplishing this result will be the Republican journals. If a reliable, stanch Republican newspaper was important when the Republican party was in power, it is doubly so now that the Democracy controls the national government.

THE INTER OCEAN will in the future as in the past, be the medium through which the best Republican thought will be given to the people. It will voice the convictions of advanced Republicans without being unfair even to Bourbon Democrats. It will be aggressively Republican without being bitterly partisan, and will give as much attention to the affairs of Cleveland's administration as it would have given to the administration of Mr. Blaine had he been elected. With special wires reaching to New York and Washington, the INTER OCEAN will use its facilities for collecting political news without fear or favor, and so far as governmental affairs or party movements are concerned will give a fuller record than any other paper.

All the old departments will be continued. The scope of the WOMAN'S KINGDOM will be widened so as to take in all industrial and reform movements in which women are interested or engaged.

OUR CURIOSITY SHOP, now a standard, will be given greater variety and interest. In the FARM AND HOME, and other departments, the widest possible range of topics will be discussed.

Of original short stories and serials, the very best by American and English authors will be given during the year. Arrangements have been made to publish during the year short stories by BOYESEN, HOWELLS, LATHROP, and others, and a new serial by the author of "One Summer" and to publish all these in addition to the serials by MISS BRADDON and other English authors.

In every department of news and literature THE INTER OCEAN will make a better record than it ever has done.

WEBSTER'S PRACTICAL

A NEW DEPARTURE IN DICTIONARIES.

An Industrial Revolution.—In a large Connecticut manufacturing establishment there is in operation a new style of furnace which produces more steam-power from a consumption of 1,000 lbs of coal than can be generated from 20,000 lbs burned in the ordinary way. In other words, the new contrivance already saves nineteen-twentieths of the fuel, and it is believed that before being publicly announced it will be so improved that the saving will reach 49 fiftieths! The facts already developed are simply incredible to one who has not actually seen them verified.

A Remarkable Coincidence.—While the new Furnace was in process of construction, the editors and publishers of Webster's Unabridged were engaged upon their new work which is as great an improvement upon all previous Dictionary productions, and just as valuable in its way as is the incredible fuel economizer above alluded to. Webster's Practical is not only a new compilation by the leading Dictionary House of the world, but it embodies several new features which, for ordinary use, render it pre-eminent among dictionaries—not excepting even the Unabridged.

1st, Condensation—By grouping all derivative and compound words under their root or leader (as in the "Book" example quoted below), such words are adequately treated in one-third of the space required by the old arrangement. By this means nearly all the desirable material of the four and five-dollar dictionaries is presented in a convenient and handy form in Webster's Practical.

2d, Association.—We comprehend as well as remember things chiefly by their associations. For this reason any one who shall carefully read the "Book" paragraph which we reproduce from Webster's Practical Dictionary, will not only comprehend it more readily, but will be able to remember two or three times as much as would be gained by reading about the same words when treated separately as in other works.

3d, Ready Reference.—Not only do we comprehend and remember more readily by the new grouping method, but we do it in less than a fourth of the time required when the words are classified in the old way. Hence, no one who values time would hesitate to pay one dollar for Webster's Practical rather than accept the best of the older dictionaries as a gift.

4th, Derivative Terminations.—Only the larger dictionaries hitherto published give the derivative terminations. The New American Dictionary, for instance, does not give any of the four variations of so common a word as forbear, while they are all given in Webster's Practical.

5th, The Illustrations in Webster's Practical are more numerous and better executed than those of any other abridged or low-priced dictionary.

6th, Prefixes and Suffixes.—Another important feature of Webster's Practical is its peculiar treatment of prefixes and suffixes, which is believed to be more desirable than a separate department of two or three hundred pages which is sometimes allotted to them.

7th, Compendium Matter.—Still another invaluable feature of Webster's Practical is its compendium matter, over one hundred pages of which is devoted to the most complete Pronouncing Vocabulary ever compiled of Biblical, Classical, Mythological, Historical and Geographical Proper names. With Webster's Practical Dictionary at hand, one need not be at a loss to correctly pronounce or spell the most difficult words.

8th, An Invaluable Book.—The importance of supplying every child with Webster's Practical for his very own, is not generally appreciated. As an educator it is worth a hundred times its price, and a little self-denial to provide one or more copies in every family will prove a better economy than an endowment of hoarded bank-stocks later on in life.

The following paragraph is reproduced from Webster's Practical.

Book, bŏŏk, n. A collection of sheets of paper, etc., bound together; a literary composition, written or printed; a subdivision of a literary work. (Mer.) A volume in which accounts are kept. — v. t. [BOOKED (bŏŏkt), BOOKING.] To enter, or register in a book. — Book'ish, a. Given to reading; more acquainted with books than with men. — Book'binder, n. One who binds books. — -bind'ery, n. A place for binding, etc. — -bind'ing, n. Art or practice of, etc. — -case, n. A case with shelves for holding books. (Bind.) A book-cover. — -cov'er, n. (Bind.) A case for a book; a cover of cloth or other material prepared for casing a book. — -keep'er, n. One who keeps accounts. — -keep'ing, n. Art of recording mercantile transactions and keeping accounts. — -learned, -lĕrn'ed, a. Versed in books; ignorant of life. — -learn'ing, n. Learning acquired by reading,—esp. as opp. to practical knowledge. — -mak'er, n. One who writes and publishes books; a compiler; a sporting man who makes a record of bets. — -mak'ing, n. The practice of, etc.; compilation; systematized betting. — -mark, n. Something placed in a book by which to find a particular place. — -plate, n. A label indicating ownership, place in a library, etc., usually on the inside of the cover of a book. — -post, n. The post-office arrangement by which books are mailed. — -sell'er, n. One who sells books. — -shelf, n. A shelf to hold books. — -shop, -stall, -store, n. A place for selling books. — -stand, n. A stand for selling books in the streets; book-stall; a support to hold books. — -worm, n. A worm or mite that eats holes in books; one excessively addicted to study.

THE QUANTITY TEST.

Webster's Practical Dictionary, ($1) 600,000 Words and 1,400 Illustrations.
New American Dictionary, ($1) 240,000, Words and 116 Illustrations.
National Popular Dictionary, ($1) 240,000, Words and 116 Illustrations.
National Standard Dictionary, ($1) 210,000 Words and 612 Illustrations.

Quality Test.—Aside from all advantages above alluded to, there is still another and very important feature of the new work to be considered, viz: its quality as compared with the cheap dictionaries which have had the largest sales, and which have been compiled chiefly from the old editions of Webster on which the copyrights have expired. Hence Webster's Practical contains more matter than any other dollar dictionary. Its quality, to say the least, is the very best, while its arrangement and all other new and desirable features, including first-class illustrations, paper, printing and binding are added without extra charge.

A Subscription Book.—As Webster's Practical is not for sale at book-stores, our readers will be able to procure it only from canvassing agents, unless it be ordered in connection with this journal in accordance with our special offers.

FARM NOTES.

WINTER CARE OF WORK HORSES.

For a winter diet there is nothing better or cheaper than corn fodder, with a ration of grain, generally oats, varying according to circumstances. For many years I have never fed hay to horses during the winter until the corn fodder was entirely gone. Horses are very fond of corn fodder and thrive upon it better than on hay; it has no tendency to produce trouble with the wind, as hay is liable to do if fed in excess, as it frequently is. Fodder is slightly constipating, but this should be remedied by a ration of wet bran now and then. Corn stalks furnish both food and bedding. The simplest way of feeding them is to stand a bundle in the manger and the horse will eat it down closely, the hard butts of the stalks being of course left. The horse seems to know, what many farmers do not seem to be able to learn, that corn butts are of little value as food. At the next feed, throw the stalk butts under the horse, and he will require no other litter, and keep cleaner on this bed than on straw. The manure is difficult to take out, but if it accumulates for a few days the stalks will be broken and easier to remove. The actual cost of feeding horses, of course, varies widely in accordance with the locality; near the large cities, with high-priced pasture land, hay and grain are much higher than in more remote districts, so that an estimate expressed in figures would not be of any value except for the locality for which it was made. The course of feeding above laid down, is as well adapted as any to the circumstances of the ordinary farmer. The stable should be well ventilated, cool, not cold; and draughts avoided if possible. The feet of horses not at work should be carefully examined every few days, at least twice a week. The ordinary diseases of the stable, "thrush" and "scratches," can be prevented in most, I was about to say in all, cases. Should any disease become established, consult a competent veterinary surgeon at once.—American Agriculturist.

GETTING HORSES INTO CONDITION.

"Condition" in horses is not fat—far from it. It is hard, tough, elastic muscle which may be actively worked without tiring the horse, without sweating, and without exhaustion of the vital forces, unless the exercise is utterly excessive. A horse out of condition is exhausted by a half mile or a mile trot, comes in puffing and breaks out in a sweat, while one in condition returns all the fresher in appearance for having his blood stirred. What makes the difference? Proper feeding, good grooming and regular work or exercise, and enough of it. All exercise tires the muscles brought into play—a tired muscle needs feeding. The feed for the muscle is digested food. After any muscle has been taxed it is for some time in a condition to appropriate from the blood the proper elements to build itself up and increase its strength. When a horse is fed immediately before labor, the food remains undigested until labor ceases and then is liable to do harm. All horsemen know that a horse should not have a feed of grain when warm, or until he has cooled off, yet when they start a horse off to any kind of hard work or road work before his food has time to digest, he is liable to be injured by it. After labor, as soon as a horse cools off and is rested, the blood, which the use of the muscles drew to the extremities, returns and is ready to take active part in the work of digestion. Then is the time to feed.

To get a horse rapidly into condition, he should be well worked or exercised according to his strength; when brought in, vigorously rubbed off and down, and when dry, cool and rested, fed. His food should be good hay when his appetite is sharpest, followed by grain (oats), which in quality should be unexceptionable, and in quantity gauged according to the work he does. Fat will sweat off, muscle will not. A fat horse is liable to indigestion, sun-stroke, cold, flatulence (colic), and ever so many other ills which a horse in condition is not only free from, but if properly fed and cleaned and worked is not liable to get. It is usually poor economy to reduce either food or exercise.—American Agriculturist.

THE STABLE FOR WINTER.

The saying that in time of peace prepare for war, might be modified to read, in time of warmth prepare for cold weather. During the heated term but little attention is paid to most stables, so they keep out rain, and if a board or strip becomes loose or comes off, it generally remains so, and the stock do not suffer in the least but rather are benefited thereby. In the rainy days of fall, however, the necessary repairs should be made for winter. It is well to have sufficient lumber stored away under shelter, as well as a few loads of good, comparatively dry clay and some sharp sand. The former to be used in altering and repairing the stalls and stables, and the latter in repairing the stall floors. We do not like any kind of stall floor other than clay or earth. During fly time the horses will have pounded out the earth, and in repairing this shovel out all the manure, as well as the ground which is admixed or saturated with manure, before putting in the clay. Fill up with clay to the height desired, and then cover with three or four inches of the sand, after which cover with straw and keep covered until the floor becomes compact. We have done this twice a year and it prevents many of the foot and leg troubles to which horses are subject when kept on plank, stone or brick floors, and they pound themselves badly during fly time on such hard and unnatural floors. Ventilation should be provided for in winter without having a draft on the animals.

WHY THE "ROYAL" IS THE BEST.

The improved method by which it has been made possible to produce pure cream of tartar, has had an important bearing upon the manufacture of baking powder. By the process heretofore generally employed it has been found impossible to remove all impurities, more particularly the tartarate of lime, which remained to such an extent as to greatly impair the quality of the cream of tartar, and to interfere seriously with the strength and wholesomeness of the baking powders into which it entered.

In the new process which is owned by the Royal Baking Powder Company of New York, and exclusively employed in its extensive tartar works, the imported crude grape acid is so treated as to remove all vestige of tartarate of lime or other impurities, giving a product before unknown—a chemically pure cream of tartar.

By the employment of these superior facilities, the Royal Baking Powder Company has made the Royal Baking Powder, as chemists all certify, of the highest possible degree of strength, "absolutely pure" and wholesome, and with an always uniform leavening power. It is for these reasons that the "Royal" never fails to produce bread, biscuits, cakes, etc. that are light, sweet, digestible and wholesome; the eating of which is never followed by indigestion, or any of those physical discomforts attendant upon the partaking of improperly prepared food. In rendering possible the production of a baking powder possessed of these qualifications, the improved method of refining cream of tartar becomes a matter of material importance to the culinary world.

The Facts Stated.

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt. William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribes his NAME to the letter, but ATTACHES HIS AFFIDAVIT to it.

In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of "secret societies."

The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

HOLDEN WITH CORDS,

OR THE POWER OF THE SECRET EMPIRE. A faithful represeutation in story of the evil influence of Freemasonry, by E. E. FLAGG, author of "Little People," "A Sunny Life," etc. This is a thrillingly interesting story, accurately true to life because mainly a narration of historical facts. 384 pages. In cloth, $1; per doz., $9. Paper, 50c; per doz., $4.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"There is no important history extant but has connected with it numerous other histories of which it was the initial point, or the dominating influence. The abduction and murder of Morgan set ten thousand secret springs in motion, as the surrender of the charters of so many lodges at that time, and the severing of their connection with the order of some forty thousand of its members indicated. This story is one of these histories, and is a collection of facts woven into a story. It cannot fail to be read with interest."—Free Methodist, Chicago.

"The republication of the Reform Story which run through the columns of the Cynosure for nearly a year is at last completed, and the book so anxiously expected by thousands of our readers has come from the press of Ezra A. Cook. The book is finely bound and fairly introduces the reader to the treasures within. The publisher has made occasional selections from Masonic works to verify the statements of the text; these make a helpful addition for some who can afford no more complete an armory of this kind."—Christian Cynosure.

"It is one of the most fascinating narratives we ever read and teaches its lesson in a manner not soon to be forgotten. It is evidently written for the heart and its words go to the heart. It is singularly free from wild denunciation. Those who are interested in the secret society question would do well to form the acquaintance of this interesting work."—Lutheran Standard, Columbus, O.

"The exciting scenes of the fall of 1826, at Batavia, N. Y., when Wm. Morgan was murdered by Masonry, are woven into the story so as to give the truth of History a setting of attractiveness. The forty chapters of the volume are soon compassed by the eager reader who begins the volume. This volume ought to be read and will be sought as its merits become known."—United Brethren in Christ.

"The story is intensely interesting and the author has succeeded in weaving into it a great deal of information in regard to this mysterious order, which is certainly startling if true, and he gives what seems to be undoubted evidence to prove his assertions. The book is one which should be read by both Masons and Antimasons."—Wayne Co. Herald.

"Our Anti-secret society friends are certainly entitled to great credit for their persistence in their efforts to expose and root out secretism. The object of the writer of this story is to present in its true light the crafty, unscrupulous and exceedingly hurtful influence of Masonry, the parent of all the orders."—Reformed Presbyterian and Covenanter.

HOUSEHOLD HINTS.

Pale blue is a pleasing color for bedrooms.

Next to palms, ivy is the most ornamental of in-door plants.

For small houses an appearance of greater size is given by having the whole lower floor carpeted alike.

Gilding, bronzing, or silvering is made very simple by the prepared metal paints, which only need be applied with a camel's hair brush.

To make plaster set quickly, mix it with water into which a little sulphate of potash has been dissolved. To make plaster set slowly, mix it with fine slacked lime.

Handsome picture frames may be made at home by glueing ears of rye or oats, tiny shells, beans or acorns, upon a simple wooden foundation. Then coat the frame and ornament with white paint. When this is thoroughly dry, cover with metal paint, either gold or bronze, and if well arranged the effect will be most satisfactory.

Oil-marks on papered walls may be removed by making a paste of cold water and pipe-clay or fuller's earth, and laying it on the surface without rubbing it on, else the pattern of the paper will then likely be injured. Leave the paste on all night. In the morning it can be brushed off, and the spot will have disappeared, but a renewal of the operation may be necessary if the oil-mark is old.

To break a new shoe put it on and button it up. Then put it into a pan of warm water deep enough to reach the lower button. Wet it nearly through; then wear it till dry, working the foot now and then. It will not hurt the looks of the shoe, but will soften the leather, shaping it to the foot. If the shoe squeaks, the sole is stiff, and for this, grease it well, heating it over the stove.

POLISH FOR PINE WOOD.—A wash of one part nitric acid in ten parts water will impart a stain resembling mahogany to pine wood that does not contain too much resin. When the wood is thoroughly dry shellac varnish will impart a fine polish to the surface. A glaze of carmine or lake will produce a rosewood finish. A turpentine extract of alkonet root produces a beautiful stain which admits of French polishing. Asphaltum, thinned with turpentine, makes a excellent mahogany color on new work.—Canadian Magazine.

IS COLD WATER INJURIOUS TO PLANTS?—In the month of December we took from our collection twelve geraniums and placed them by themselves in the conservatory; six of these we watered with cold water, drawn from a hydrant pipe at the temperature of 45 degrees, and the other six were supplied with water from a barrel standing in the conservatory, and of the same temperature of the house; that is from 60 to 80 degrees. The plants watered with cold water gave little, if any bloom throughout the winter, while the six geraniums watered from the barrel grew finely and bloomed profusely.

Always water your plants in winter with lukewarm water, if you would have a profusion of flowers, and thrifty, growing plants. The water should be of the same temperature as the room or place in which the plants are kept. There is no theory about it; this is a practical fact.—Am. Agriculturist.

WATER PROOF CLOTH.—If we immerse a tissue in a solution composed of gelatine 5 parts, soap 5 parts, alum 7 parts, water 170 parts, we shall find, upon lifting and thoroughly drying the cloth, that we have communicated to the surface of each particular filament of which the stuff is composed the property of exercising on water a repulsive force. Consequently, if upon the stuff water be thrown, it will not penetrate between threads; it will be repelled; it will run over without passing through. The texture of the stuff has not been changed by the immersion in the alumnious bath, and gases and vapor can traverse it as before.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE.

In Impaired Nerve Function.

Dr. C. A. FERNALD, Boston, Mass., says: "I have used it in cases of impaired nerve function, with beneficial results, especially in cases where the system is affected by the toxic action of tobacco."

A considerable part of the report is directed to the object of pooling, which Nimmo regards as an expedient to which the railroad companies had recourse, not willingly, but through the necesssity to protect themselves from the ruinous effects of a war of rates and also to protect themselves against popular indignation caused by the evils of secret rates to individual shippers.

It is reported from Portland, Ore., that as the snow clears away and the roads open news of deaths in the mountains from excessive cold comes in. Seven deaths are reported as a direct result of the recent storm.

In Northwestern Nebraska the report is confirmed of the freezing to death of seven men on the Niobrara River road. Two of the men were found sitting in a buggy, frozen stiff, the horse having reached a station with his silent drivers This Niobrara case of freezing should not be confounded with that where it was reported that fourteen men had perished along the new Sioux City and Pacific grade, which has not been confirmed.

FOREIGN.

Gen. Wolseley telegraphs the Prince of Wales that he will march on Khartoum Jan. 24. He requests that 3,000 picked troops be dispatched at once to Suakim to operate against Osman Digna and open the Berber route.

An official bulletin states that up to the 8th inst. in the provinces of Grenada and Malaga, Spain, 1,400 persons have been killed by the earthquakes, 900 wounded and 43,000 rendered homeless. Fifteen thousand have left Grenada. People are generally of the opinion that the end of the world is at hand, and are seeking absolution of the priests. The village of Guevejar is slowly sliding downward to the valley.

The opinion is growing that a formal declaration of war by France against China is imminent. French soldiers in China are suffering from fever. The mortality is reported to be appalling.

The failure of the English Admiral at Hong Kong to give information of a temporary suspension by the French of the blockade of the island of Formoso, thus preventing the sailing of relief ships to the island, has caused a good deal of feeling in China against England. The Chinece Embassador at London has entered his protest against the conduct of the British Admiral.

In the circular to friends about the "Webster's Practical Dictionary" a typographical error makes it say that the dictionary contains 6,000 instead of 600,000 words. Remember that this work is printed on good paper, in clear type, and has 1,400 illustrations and 600,000 words.

W. B. Stoddard sent in 49 new subscriptions and one renewal. All were secured during the week ending Dec. 31st ult. Of these 11 were for one year, 1 for eight months, 9 for six months, 3 for four months and 26 for two months.

Mrs. A. E. Jenks adds to her former abundant labors three yearly subscriptions and the name of Mr. J. L. Whipple as an agent for the Cynosure.

Jas. White, Raysville, Ind., sends in three subscriptions for a year, one new and two renewals.

Mr. Isaac Flagg writes: "I am so situated as to be unable to canvass for the Cynosure or to do so much in circulating it among my neighbors as I would like, but I mean to do all I can." He encloses $3 to send the Cynosure to two Southern ministers who are unable to subscribe for it but who desire it.

Edward Bascom sends in six renewals and writes: "We should like to have the State Convention in this town (Greensburg, Ohio). I think we can entertain the delegates free, if we have a timely notice."

One new subscription and one renewal are received from A. C. Pratt. He says: "I will try and get some more and will renew my subscription in due time."

A. C. Hall donates a year's subscription of the Cynosure to his pastor, and says: "As this is a donation, please stop when the time is out, unless renewed." If all who donate the paper to friends would be careful to so order, it would save us trouble and the party receiving the paper would sometimes be saved annoyance.

C. Quick, of Weston, Mich., sends in three yearly subscriptions. He says: "I expect to obtain some more names as soon as I can see the parties. I like the paper as well as ever."

Joseph Cook, the great lecturer, will begin a new series of his wonderful Monday lectures in Tremont Temple, Boston, on the first Monday in February. If the Phelan assassiation case develops a secret lodge origin, as it probably will if investigated, it should furnish Mr. Cook with an excellent opportunity for a powerful prelude on the whole lodge question.

While Francis Murphy, the temperance apostle, was laboring several weeks in Chicago a year ago, after some study of his work, it seemed a fair judgment upon it that it lacked some elements of permanence which attended Mr. Moody's efforts in a similar direction. Mr. Murphy proclaimed the necessity of Divine aid to overcome the liquor appetite, but he did not lead clearly to the Saviour who renders this aid. Temperance was put first. Very naturally the Good Templar lodges fattened upon his converts, but the churches did not. When the test of election came Mr. Murphy opposed making the grog shop an issue. Now in Pittsburg it is said he is beginning a church upon the sandy foundation of his temperance gospel, and will call it the "Church of Gospel Temperance." Is not a church of Christ enough for Mr. Murphy? If not, his work will "come to naught."

The correspondence between Wm. H. Vanderbilt and General and Mrs. Grant forms a very tender page in the history of the latter's financial misfortunes. The day before the great failure of Grant and Ward last spring, the General, supposing his firm perfectly secure, borrowed $150,000 of Vanderbilt as a temporary loan. The crash so soon following made this a debt of honor, and farms, houses and the swords, medals and works of art, memorials of his victories and gifts of the nations were mortgaged for its payment. A proposition to raise a fund to meet this obligation was checked by a note from General Grant, and then Mr. Vanderbilt gave Mrs. Grant the mortgages and memorials with the request that the latter be presented to the government at her husband's death. The latter part of the arrangement was accepted, but the first refused. This correspondent has aroused much sympathy for General Grant and has been the means probably of renewing in Congress a bill to restore him to the retired list of the army, which was not well received a year ago. Gen. Rosecrans, chairman of the House Military Committee, will give it a rough passage, however, as a bit of private revenge for his own retirement from the army after losing the disastrous battle of Chickamauga.

Grant's financial troubles are supplimented by bodily ills, probably caused by years of excessive smoking, at least greatly aggravated by that ruinous habit. The papers report the medical treatment prescribed to get the nicotine poison out of his system, and the doctors acknowledge they forbade his smoking almost entirely. The General obeyed by putting away his cigar entirely, and is improving much in health. At last the warning of that godly old anti-tobacco prophet, George Trask of Fitchburg, Massachusetts, has come true. His public appeals to General Grant to cease leading American youth to ruin by his great example in an evil practice were little heeded fifteen years ago, but God has not forgotten them. If the moral obligation to these young men could be as easily cancelled as his debt to Vanderbilt General Grant might think himself happy.

The Republican bribery business into which a member of the National Committee has attempted to implicate St. John, has additional interest from a lengthy reply from the latter and a few more remarks from Clarkson. The reply is straight-forward and manly, like its author's rejoinder to the pseudo New York society that demanded his withdrawal. Everybody who has been mentioned in this controversy, and in whose word the public can rely, is asked to give that public the benefit of his knowledge. The accuser, Clarkson, is now driven finally to the last resort of the slanderer who knows his jury is fixed—he dares St. John to take the case into the courts! There are one or two good reasons why St. John should rely as much on a good record for years as on a jury decision: probably not one in a hundred people mistrust him; and, if ever Freemasons can get him into court they will ruin him for what he has said against them, as sure as Morgan was lost when the lodge got him into Canandaigua jail!

The obsequies of the late Schuyler Colfax, Vice President during General Grant's first term, were held on Saturday at his home in South Bend, Indiana. Notwithstanding Mr. Colfax's amiable disposition and long and useful public life, the shadow of the Credit Mobilier was never lifted altogether from his fame. While few believe him guilty of actual dishonor in that affair, many mistrust a man who to the last was a stalwart defender of the secret lodge of Odd-fellows, and gave much of his life to the exaltation of this foreign, un-American, un-Christian system. The local lodge, Grand Lodge, and Grand Encampment of this order were represented with much ostentation among his bearers. Judge Gresham, late Post-Master General, and now of the United States Court in this city, was designated as one of the bearers, but did not finally appear among them. There may have been too much lodge mummery for him.

Although the distillers and wholesale liquor dealers of the country have not been able to get Congress to show them any favor in remitting their tax, the new Secretary of the Treasury, McCulloch, has come to their relief, and by a decision respecting taxes to be paid on whiskey exported has virtually extended the bonded period, for which there has been so long and bitter a fight. The dealers load a vessel for Bermuda and bring it back without once touching the cargo. By Mr. McCulloch's decision the tax is suspended on such shipments, and may never be paid. There is some conscience, however, among local revenue officers. It has been discovered that whiskey is being sent into Iowa and Kansas, prohibitory States, inside barrels of flour, and measures taken to stop the business.

The Indian bill just agreed upon by the House Committee in Congress, has two clauses which, if they had been thought of thirty years ago, would have saved this country a hundred thousand lives and as many millions of money. The first provides for fine and imprisonment whenever any person shall furnish any Indian with guns or amunition, except civilized Indians of the Indian Territory; the second for punishment by fine and imprisonment of persons introducing ardent spirits into the Indian country. The President is also empowered to disarm such Indians as in his judgment may seem best for the public peace. Had the white man's whisky been kept from the Indians half their troubles would have been prevented, and nearly the other half had they been disarmed; for even the wretches who reckoned nothing of human life when it stands in the way of gold would have had some mercy on an unarmed race. How late are we learning to be less savage than the Red man!

CRIME.

BY REV. B. T. ROBERTS.

There is something alarming in the increase in the number and enormity of crimes committed in this country. The daily papers are fast becoming records of daily crimes. The most fearful atrocities are perpetrated, in a time of plenty, in a country that provides the means of gaining an honest livelihood for all who are willing to work. It is said that in England, out of every ten thousand deaths, seven are through crime, in France eight, and in Ireland the same, while in the United States there are twenty-one. That is, there is in this land three times the amount of the highest kind of crime that there is in England. In the latest report of the Prison Association of New York it is stated that "there has been an increase in the criminal population of the State of 33 per cent. over the highest estimate of 1870, while the population has increased only 20 per cent." In the various prisons of the State there are 15,690 convicts. This report says:

"It is estimated that the proportion of the criminal population at present in custody of the State is only one-fifth of the entire class of criminals, which gives us the appalling showing, in a population of five millions, of seventy-five thousand persons directly or indirectly interested in the success of criminal practices, preying upon property, endangering human life, and contaminating society."

Among the causes of this fearful increase of crime, we accord a prominent place to the spread of atheistic sentiments among the people. Many who affect to be learned and liberal have adopted the baseless theory of evolution. Influenced by these, many of the common people have thrown off the fear of God along with a belief in his existence. If anything has been proved by human experience, it is that human society cannot be held together without religion. One of the bloodiest chapters in the history of the world is that of France immediately following the abolition of Christianity, and a profession of atheism by the National Assembly. The streets of Paris were red with the blood of the chief men of the nation. This period is appropriately known in history as the "Reign of Terror." The Nihilists of the old world, with their murderous plots against rulers, are atheists, and are acting consistently with their belief. Any religion is better for a community than no religion. Ireland, with all its poverty, and ignorance, and superstition, and political disturbances, has fewer criminals in proportion to its population than Massachusetts, with all its wealth, and boasted culture and liberal philosophy.

Another cause of the increase of crime is the spread and growing popularity of secret societies. At its best Freemasonry, the father of them all, is a conspiracy of the strong against the weak. It is but natural that bad men should seek to unite with a society to which many of the leading officers of government belong, each member of which swears, under the most tremendous oaths, that "I will aid and assist a companion, when engaged in any difficulty, and espouse his cause so far as to extricate him from the same, if within my power, whether he be right or wrong." No matter how clear the testimony may be against a member of any of these leading secret societies, it is very difficult to convict him. Impunity in crime multiplies criminals.

Another fertile cause of crime is the making, by the popular churches, of the conditions of salvation so easy. It sometimes seems as if there is a competition among these churches to see which shall make the way to heaven the broadest.

We were, soon after the close of our civil war, asked to lead a large union prayer meeting in New York. They sang at the opening, the hymn then so popular, the sentiment of which remains too popular still:

"Nothing either great or small
Remains for me to do,
Jesus died and paid it all,
All the debt I owe."

We took the hymn for a text and spoke a few minutes. We showed that even John the Baptist insisted that his converts should "bring forth fruits meet for repentance;" that under the preaching of Peter the people were pricked in their heart and cried out, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" Acts 2: 37. Under the preaching of Paul, "Many that believed, came and confessed, and showed their deeds. Many of them also which used curious arts brought their books together, and burned them before all men; and they counted the price of them and found it fifty thousand pieces of silver." Acts 19: 18, 19.

At the close of the service a gentleman desired a private interview. It was granted. He said that he had professed to be converted last winter, when they sang for him the hymn above referred to. But he said, as nearly as he could make out, he had robbed the government of about thirty thousand dollars! We told him there was no use in his professing to be converted unless he was willing to make restitution. He went away sad, but kept on with his profession. He became a popular worker in the popular revivals, and afterward was sent to State prison for a crime committed while engaged in his evangelistic labors.

This telling people who have been guilty of fraud, and dishonesty, and villainy, and even murder, that they can be forgiven, and go to heaven by saying they "believe in Jesus," and uniting with the church, is not only deceiving souls to their eternal undoing, but is encouraging crime in all its dimensions. Patriotism no less than fidelity to Christ demands that we insist upon repentance, proved by its fruits—confession, restitution and the abandonment of every evil way—to be genuine, as a condition of forgiveness. Let men feel that the way of wrong doing is the direct way to hell, and that there is no escape, but by confessiug the wrong and undoing it as far as is in their power, and they will hesitate before they will enter upon a career of crime.

Finally, the increase in the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage has a direct connection with the increase of crime. A very large proportion of criminal, murderous assaults are made under the influence of liquor. Men go to the bar to drink, as friends. Maddened by liquor, before they separate, they seek to kill each other. There is a ghastly inconsistency in our licensing saloons, and then building prisons in which to gather the harvest of these saloons. The State licenses schools of crime, and then punishes criminals! We should speedily wipe out this blot upon our civilization.

MASONIC COVENANTS INVALID.

BY J. P. STODDARD.

Occasionally I meet a person who clings to the old and exploded idea that the "covenant" or oath which "makes the Mason" is binding. But very few specimens of this kind are found among intelligent persons, who have given attention to the subject, and even the more conscientious members of the craft are reluctantly conceding that it is optional with the man to keep or disregard his Masonic oath. For the benefit of the few who are still benighted, I will restate some of the reasons why Masonic oaths are not binding:

1. They require what no man ever did, or can perform.

2. They are unauthorized by any competent authority, and are therefore blasphemy.

3. They are obtained by deception, and accompanied with promises that the lodge never keeps.

4. They are grossly immoral and infamously degrading in their terms, and horridly barbarous in their penalties.

5. They are in direct conflict with God's order in the family, in society, in the state and the church.

6. They are condemned and their violation justified, in the "impressive" lessons of the third degree, where it is shown that "twelve Fellowcrafts" who broke their secret oath were commended, while "Jubula, Jubulo, and Jubulum," who kept their "covenant" were condemned and executed.

7. They are forbidden as sinful by the divine law as recorded in Leviticus 4: 5, where swearing to do unknown things, or keep unknown commauds is strictly condemned.

Many other reasons might be added, but either of the above is sufficient to justify any man in breaking his Masonic covenant, and the positively evil character and gross immorality of the system demands that not only every Christian, but every moral and patriotic citizen should "reprove," and seek to abolish such "unfruitful works of darkness."

REMEMBER THE POOR.

BY REV. J. F. AVERY, EDITOR OF "BUDS AND BLOSSOMS."

A certain man clung to all and lost all. He had nowhere to stow his goods; it caused him great perplexity, and anxiety after the tearing down and enlarging of his store-house. The foolishness of his resolutions is plain. He had made no provision for a removal or enjoyment of his gains when he should be removed; and seeing he was but a tenant at the will of another, and lived in a land of frequent change, he showed lack of judgment in stowing all his goods, and doing all his building on such an uncertain foundation. Solomon saith, "The prudent man forseeth the evil and hideth himself;" but this mau, with much carefulness, gathered and heaped all together. He had no sympathy for others; was careful to prevent waste; built and enlarged his barns, and by stowing ALL, thought he had made ample store. He did not trust to the charity of others; he took care of Number One. Let others do the same. His strength and ambition was spent in getting gain. Others enjoyed themselves with the good things of life, and gave a portion thereof to the needy and deserving. They could delight themselves in the pleasure of a child. "Do unto others as you would they should do unto you." Lay up treasure, out of sight it may be to the miser-eye, but gloriously in sight to the eye trained by love and faith. "The liberal soul shall be made fat." But look at the churl. His heart has become by a gradual process of selfishness like a stone, hard, unfeeling, and lifeless. Presently, out of pure selfishness, he goes to work to seek a little self-indulgence, for with bursting barns he feels a terrible uneasiness, and sometimes cries, "O my leanness! my leanness!" As a remedy and cure, after deliberate consideration, he saith, "I know what I will do, I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry."

The great Teacher introducing this story said, "Take heed and beware of covetousness." Observe the covetousness here illustrated. "What shall I do?" We have heard these words come from pinched lips, when they have told the agony of poverty. But from such a monster, they excite our contempt. Every man has a right to save, no man a right to save all. When God gives abundance, at least, there should be dropped a few handfuls, on purpose for the less fortunate who have to glean after the gatherers of plenty. Not so, he said, "I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods." No large hearted man when his ground brings forth abundance would wish to husband all the fruit. He would call his poor neighbors, and say, "Come and eat part, at least, of this perishable good, lest to me and you it be lost. Eat my friends, and let us have a harvest home of thanksgiving unto the great Giver." But, said the selfish man, "now for self and ease, I have laid up all my fruits and my goods." Listen to what God said unto him, "Thou fool, this night do they require thy soul; then whose shall these things be which thou hast provided?" Souls do not eat such husks. Even this carnal-minded schemer found himself provisionless and hopelessly undone.

Beware of covetousness, which is idolatry. Our God is a jealous God. His honor must not be given to another. Our selfish plans and ends will and must miscarry. If we sow not the seeds of charity, the day of want will come, when ill-gotten gains and hoarded gold will only add to eternal torment; will add to the great and fiery trial, when the unhallowed gold, like molten lead, shall wrap itself around the selfish man as a garment of liquid fire. God grant, that the Bible story of the fool's unpreparedness may stir some cold nature to new acts of obedience, and to the testing of the blessedness of giving, when the store is full, to some who are poor and helpless. Adding joy to the homes and hearts of poverty's children may be a new line of thought and occupation for money-lovers. Nevertheless let them try it, and it will, as the nerve of generosity is touched, awaken a warmth of feeling strangely delightful, and it will quicken good impulses and open avenues of pleasure undreamt of. Try it!

LODGE ROT INCURABLE.

That "illustrious brother, Enoch T. Carson, 33o," in an address to Scottish rite Masons in Cinciunati, asserts that "they are managed by the same persons, directed to the same ends, and governed by the same principles as the blue degrees." The rauk and file of Freemasonry, who from lack of money or influence, fail to reach a lower depth than three degrees, and who are accustomed to denounce the "higher grades" as unmasonic, will read with some degree of interest their illustrious brother's flattering opinion, as expressed by him in the same address: "Whatever was the origin of the high grades, they appear to be exactly suited to our wants. It is notorious that men of disreputable conduct and character too often find admission into craft lodges. The companionship of the dissolute and dishonest will be naturally shunned by reflective and conscientious persons, who may still admire the principles of Masonry, and even desire to draw closer the ties which unite them to their worthier brethren. Thus doubtless the higher grades became gradually engrafted upon Freemasonry." Anticipating, possibly, similar charges by "the dissolute and dishonest" blue lodge brethren against their aristocratic managers, Mr. Carson candidly adds, "But some of them (the higher grades) having got into the hands of men of very indifferent character and of inferior position, have occasionally become deformed by their vulgarity, and disgraced by vices which are indeed too prevalent in all conditions, but are greatly checked by the habits and manners of good society."

In making these serious charges against the fraternity, "brother" Carson has certainly violated that part of his Masonic oath which forbids him speaking "evil of a brother Master Mason, neither behind his back, nor before his face," to the performance of which he bound himself "under no less penalty than to have his body severed in two in the midst, and divided to the north and south, his bowels burned to ashes in the center, and the ashes scattered before the four winds of heaven." A. R.

A SOUTHERNER ON THE MISTAKE OF THE SOUTH.

[From Geo. W Cable's article in the Century for January.]

Thus we reach the ultimate question of fact. Are the freedman's liberties suffering auy real abridgement? The answer is easy. The letter of the laws, with but few exceptions, recognize him as entitled to every right of an American citizen; and to some it may seem unimportant that there is scarcely one public relation of life in the South where he is not arbitrarily and unlawfully compelled to hold toward the white man the attitude of an alien, a menial, and a probable reprobate by reason of his race and color. One of the marvels of future history will be that it was counted a small matter by a majority of our Nation, for 6,000,000 of people within it, made by its own decree a component part of it, to be subjected to a system of oppression so rauk that nothing could make it seem small except the fact that they had already been ground under it for a century and a half.

Examine it. It proffers to the freedman a certain security of life and property, and then holds the respect of the community, that dearest of earthly boons, beyond his attainment. It gives him certain guarantees against thieves and robbers, and then holds him under of the mass of good men and women. It acknowledges in constitutions and statutes his title to an American's freedom and aspirations, and then in daily practice heaps upon him in every public place the most odious distinctions, without giviug ear to the humblest plea concerning mental or moral character. It spurns his ambition, tramples on his languishing self-respect, and indignantly refuses to let him either buy with money or earn by any excellence of inner life or outward behavior the most momentary immunity from these public indignities even for his wife aud daughters. Need we cram these pages with facts in evidence, as if these were charges denied and requiring to be proven? They are simply the present avowed and defended state of affairs peeled of its exteriors.

Nothing but the habit, geuerations old, of enduring it, could make it endurable by men not in actual slavery. Were we whites of the South to remain every way as we are, and our 6,000,000 blacks to give place to any sort of whites exactly their equals, man for man, in mind, morals, and wealth, provided only that they had tasted two years of American freedom, and were this same system of tyrannies attempted upon them, there would be as this continent has ever seen. We can say this quietly. There is not a scruple's weight of present danger. These 6,000,000 freedmen are dominated by 9,000,000 whites immeasurably stronger than they, backed by the virtual consent of 31,000,000 more. Indeed, nothing but the habit of oppression could make such oppression possible to a people of the intelligence and virtues of our Southern whites, and the invitation to practice it on millions of any other than the children of their former slaves would be spurned with a noble indignation.

Suppose, for a moment, the tables turned. Suppose the courts of our Soutnern States, while changing no laws requiring the impaneling of jurymen without distinction as to race, etc., should suddenly begin to draw their thousands of jurymen all black, and well-nigh every one of them counting not only himself, but all his race, better than any white man. Assuming that this average of intelligence and morals should not be below that of jurymen as now drawn, would a white man, for all that, choose to be tried in one of those courts? Would he suspect nothing? Could one persuade him that his chances of even justice, were all they should be, or all they would be, were the court not evading the law in order to sustain against him because of the accidents of his birth? Yet only read white man for black man, and black man for white man, and that—I speak as an eye-witness—has been the practice for years, and is still so to-day; an actual emasculation, in the case of 6,000,000 people both as plaintiff and defendant, of the right of trial by jury.

In this and other practices the outrage falls upon the freedman. Does it stop there? Far from it. It is the first premise of American principles that whatever elevates the lower stratum of the people lifts all the rest, and whatever holds it down holds all down. For twenty years, therefore, the Nation has peen working to elevate the freedman. It counts this one of the great necessities of the hour. It has poured out its wealth publicly and privately for this purpose. It is confidently expected that it will soon bestow a royal gift of millions for the reduction of the illiteracy so largely shared by the blacks. Our Southern States are, and for twenty years have been, taxing themselves for the same end. The private charities alone, of the other State have given $20,000,000 in the same good cause. Their colored seminaries; colleges, and normal schools dot our whole Southern country, and furnish our public colored schools with a large part of their teachers. All this and much more has been, or is being done, in order that, for the good of himself and everybody else in the land, the colored man may be elevated as quickly as possible from the and semi-slavery to the full stature and integrity of citizenship. And it is in the face of all this that the adherent of the old regime stands in the way to every public privilege and place—steamer landing, railway platform, theatre, concert hall, art display, public library, public school, court house, church, everything—flourishing the hot branding-iron of ignominious distinctions. He forbids the freedman to go into the water until he is satisfied that he knows how to swim, and for fear he should learn hangs millstones about his neck. This is what we are told is a small matter that will settle itself. Yes, like a roosting curse, until the outraged intelligence of the South lifts its indignant protest against this stupid firing into our own ranks.

The laws passed in the days of compulsory reconstruction requiring "equal accommodations," etc., for colored and white persons were freedmen's follies. On their face they defeated their ends; for even in theory they at once reduced to half all opportunity for those more reasonable and mutually agreeable self-assortments which public assemblages and groups of passengers find it best to make in all other enlightened countries, making them on the score of conduct, dress, and price. They also led the whites to overlook what they would have seen instantly had these invidious distinctions been made against themselves; that their offense does not vanish at the guarantee against the loss of physical comforts. But we made, and are still making,

A MISTAKE BEYOND EVEN THIS.

For years many of us have carelessly taken for granted that these laws were being carried out in some shape that removed all just ground of complaint.

It is common to say, "We allow the man of color to come and go at will, only let him sit apart in a place marked off for him." But marked off how? So as to mark him instantly as a menial. Not by railings and partitions merely, which, raised against any other class in the United States with the same invidious intent, would be kicked down as fast as put up, but by giving him besides, in every instance, and without recourse, the most uncomfortable, unclean, and unsafe place, and the unsafety, uncleanness, and discomfort of most of these places are a shame to any community pretending to practice public justice. If any one can think the freedman does not feel the indignities thus heaped upon him, let him take up any paper printed for colored men's patronage, or ask any colored man of known courageous utterance. Hear them:

"We ask not Congress, not the Legislature, nor any other power to remedy these evils, but we ask the people among whom we live; those who can remedy them if they will; those who have a high sense of honor and a deep moral feeling; those who have one vestige of human sympathy left; those are the ones we ask to protect us in our weakness and ill-treatments. As soon as the colored man is treated by the white man as a man, that harmony and pleasant feeling which should characterize all races which dwell together, shall be the bond of peace between them."

Surely their evidence is good enough to prove their own feelings. We need not lean upon it here for anything else. I shall not bring forward a single statement of fact from them or any of their friends who share many of their humiliations, though my desk is covered with them. But I beg to make the same citations that I made last June in the far South. It was this: One hot night in September of last year I was traveling by rail in the State of Alabama. At rather late bed-time there came aboard the train a young mother and her little daughter of three or four years. They were neatly and tastefully dressed in cool, fresh muslins, and as the train went on its way they sat together very still and quiet. At the next station there came aboard a most melancholy and revolting company. In filthy rags, with vile odors and the clanking of shackles and chains, nine penitentiary convicts chained to one chain and ten more chained to another, dragged laboriously into the compartment of the car where in one corner sat this mother and child, and packed it full, and the train moved on. The keeper of the convicts told me he should take them in the car two hundred miles that night. They were going to the mines. My seat was not in that car, and I staid in it but a moment. It stank insufferably. I returned to my own place in the coach behind, where there was, and had all the time been, plenty of room. But the mother and child sat on in silence in that foul hole, the conductor having distinctly refused them admission elsewhere because they were of African blood, and not because the mother was, but because she was not, engaged at the moment in menial service. Had the child been white, and the mother not its natural she could have sat anywhere in the train, and no one would have ventured to object, even had she been as black as the mouth of the coal-pit to which her loathsome fellow-passengers were being carried in chains.

FROM MY OWN EXPERIENCE

Such is the incident as I saw it. But the illustration would be incomplete here were I not allowed to add the comments I made upon it when in June last I recounted it, and to state the two opposite tempers in which my words were received. I said: "These are the facts. And yet you know and I know we belong to communities that, after years of hoping for, are at least taking comfort in the assurance of the Nation's highest courts that no law can reach and stop this shameful foul play until we choose to enact a law to that end ourselves. And now the East and North and West of our great and prosperous and happy country, and the rest of the civilized world, as far as it knows our case, are standing and waiting to see what we will write upon the white page of to-day's and to-morrow's history, now that we are simply on our honor and on the mettle of our far and peculiarly famed Southern instinct. How long, then, shall we stand off from such ringing moral questions as these on the flimsy plea that they have a political value, and, scrutinizing the Constitution, keep saying: 'Is it so nominated in the bond? I cannot find it; 'tis not in the bond.' "

BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS:

OR

THE QUESTION OF THE HOUR.

BY E. E. FLAGG, AUTHOR OF "HOLDEN WITH CORDS."

Of course if Pat had been a politician he would never have reasoned in this simple fashion. He would have doubted whether laws restricting the liberty of the individual citizen to eat and drink what he chooses are constitutional. He would have pointed to the difficulty, if not the utter impossibility, of enforcing such laws as a proof that they originated in a narrow and ill-regulated zeal; and he would have capped the climax of his arguments and objections by saying that, so long as taxation was the nation's only source of revenue, the true policy was not to prohibit liquor but to tax it so heavily as to make it the servant and ally of government, even letting it pay the entire school bill of the Union; and thus lifting the whole business to the dignity of a permanent institution based on national interests.

But, unfortunately, this poor, unenlightened Hibernian had never been instructed in those peculiar views of political economy which prevail among so many of our statesmen at Washington; and in his new hope of getting the upper hand of the whisky-jug forever, must we say that he forgot, with all the reprehensible fickleness of his race, every one of his oft-repeated promises to vote only for the Republican candidate!

"It's all thrue, what ye say. I'd be a sight better off, and Katy and the childher, if there warn't a drap o' the vile crathur to be had in the wide worruld, let alone Jacksonville. And if Col. Hicks will be afther shutting up the dramshops, Pat Murphy is the man that'll vote for him, and glad to do ye a favor, mum." And Pat went up to the ballot-box to enjoy for the first time since he took out his naturalization papers the full exercise of his freeman's right; while one of Jacksonville's leading saloonists who did a large business in so-called "temperance drinks," and considered himself in a modest way as decidedly a benefactor to society, expressed rather loudly his opinion that "it was a shame for respectable women to be bull-dozing poor laboring men into voting away their personal liberty. They had as much right to their beer as they had to their bread."

Martin Treworthy, waiting with the throng of voters, heard this speech, and was moved by the spirit to reply.

"If this is the kind of bull-dozing they practice, all I can say is it's a pity we can't have more of it. They've made the polls for one day a fit place for a decent man. You are dreadful tender of the poor man's right to his beer, but why not turn the tables once in awhile and give us a talk about the rights of his wife and children to their bread? It would be a kind of refreshing variety, now."

The vender of "temperance" drinks found too many in the crowd against him to make much reply, and slunk away discomfited; while, heedless of everything but their one object, this brave detachment of the great white ribbon army, through evil report and good report, kept steadily at their posts, pouring out the steaming cups and handing no-license tickets, till the polls closed with this united testimony from friend and foe that never before had so orderly an election been held in Jacksonville.

Its results we will leave for our next chapter, while we transport our readers once more to that farm-house among the hills where another letter from Stephen has just arrived, to be read and re-read and talked over, and then laid carefully away in a corner of the square mahogany desk, which, according to authentic tradition, formed one of the few earthly possessions of the exiled clergyman previously alluded to as the founder of the Howland line; and which was, therefore, dated less than half a century after the sailing of the Mayflower.

This family ark, the sacred depository for the family valuables, Mrs. Phœbe Howland now proceeded to reverently unlock and open, while her husband, wearied with his farm-work, leaned back comfortably in the feather-cushioned arm-chair and contemplated the fire; his thoughts traveling meanwhile over quite a circle of new ideas opened before him by Stephen's letter. Finally he broke out:

"I don't care what folks say about 'woman's sphere;' it is always right where God puts her, and I'm glad for one that the women are rousing up to stop this saloon business. I hope God will give 'em grace to hang on till the whole cursed system falls as flat as the walls of Jericho."

Now Mrs. Phœbe Howland was the most conservative of New England matrons, which is saying a great deal. The only place where she allowed her native gifts to have full scope was the female prayer meeting. There, her wonderfully earnest petitions, her pointed exhortations and eloquent appeals to Christian duty made her a natural leader. But there were times when her heart was thrilled with such a deep longing to give out more freely and fully of what was in her that it was almost pain; yet her soul, naturally tuned to the grand and the heroic, fitted itself to the humblest daily duties without a murmur, and the result was no actual narrowing of her spiritual powers, but rather a condensing, as of some exquisite perfume under the distiller's art, so that whatever she said or did was like a drop from the alabaster box of ointment. Its fragrance filled the house.

"Women followed Jesus to the cross," she said, coming back to her seat and her knitting (four pairs of lamb's wool socks destined for the absent Stephen). "I think I could follow him to the polls if I felt certain that God called me there. But I greatly fear that in this movement there may be many who will not stop to take counsel of the Spirit, but run before they are sent, to the harm and hindrance of the cause. I rejoice at everything that looks like a fulfillment of the prophecy, 'I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh;' but in this calling of women to public work I can only rejoice with trembling, for they are human as well as men, and if they don't keep close to the Lord I know how it will be. Pride and ambition and self-seeking will come in and spoil all they are doing."

And there fell between the two a long silence, broken again by Mr. Josiah Howland whose thoughts though they seemed to be pursuing another track, had really followed logically in the line of Phœbe's last remarks.

"Mother, there's one thing I've noticed about Stephen's letters lately. He don't say a word about religion, yet I think he gave good evidence before he went from home of having met with a change, and I feel kinder afraid that he's letting his mind get all taken up with other concerns. Temperance work can't be carried on to have it amount to much without Christ behind us, and I wish when you write to him you'd say something that will draw him out a little to speak of his spiritual state. I'm glad he's prospering and getting on; tell him that. I don't grudge a dollar I've spent on his education. 'But what shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?' "

To this Puritan couple this problem held in solution every interest of time and eternity; for what were riches, learning, or fame, but as the small dust of the balance weighed against immortal life?

CHAPTER VIII.

MARTIN TREWORTHY DISCOURSES ON HUMBUGS.

Martin Treworthy's hermitage looked as inviting as a bright light and a good fire could make it. The furniture had all been bought in reference to that marriage which never was to be; and so it happened that many tasteful bits of ornament scattered here and there through the homely apartment seemed to shed over it the light of a gracious feminine presence, as if the one who was to have been its pride and joy had only left her sewing-chair in the corner for one brief moment.

On a bracket in one corner stood a vase of dried grasses; her hands had arranged them. In the window stood a pot of ivy; she had rooted it from a tiny slip. There was not a niche or corner to which Martin Treworthy's eyes could turn without resting on some momento of her he had loved and lost, and he liked to have it so.

He was really one of those crystallized poets whose feelings move to rhyme and rhythm while they generally talk the most rugged, matter-of-fact prose. He had a dim idea, which he could by no means have explained, that there are vibrations of soul as well as of sound and light, so that even in the ineffable glories of the New Jerusalem the spirit of his beloved might be conscious that he still remembered her with an affection stronger than death. And who shall say that it is not so? What warrant for believing that earthly love founded in heavenly hope can perish? The blossom may be nipped, but the root is perrennial and native to Paradise.

It was a disagreeable evening. A keen, raw wind was blowing the clouds in great dark masses across the sky—treasuries of snow and hail that only waited Jehovah's bidding to be unlocked by the angel of the elements and scattered broadcast over the shivering earth. Nelson Newhall occupied one corner of the settee that extended its comfortable length before the fire which was blazing brightly under Martin Treworthy's vigorous application of the poker.

"Seems as if the cold weather was setting in uncommon early," the latter remarked. "If signs mean anything we are going to have a cold winter. I met an old comrade of mine the other day—perhaps you've heard of him, Dan Carter—he was with me in Kansas, but he's settled down now to the trapping business; been at it ten years; and he tells me he never saw the fur so thick on the musk-rats as it is this season."

But Nelson just now was not interested in weather prognostications, and abruptly changed the subject.

"I want to know how long we've got to submit to having our rights over-ridden in this fashion. With a fair ballot and a fair count Jacksonville could have been carried triumphantly for no-license. Now we must stand the saloon curse another year. It is perfectly infamous and outrageous to play such a trick on temperance men in the first place, and then deny us the right to a recount."

Martin Treworthy drummed gently with the poker a moment before speaking.

"'The Lord reigneth; let the earth rejoice.' I've known times when it was like pulling eye-teeth to say that; when it seemed as if the devil was reigning, and every good man ought to hide his head and wear sackcloth and ashes; when I saw husbands and fathers shot down like dogs on the plains of Kansas just for defending their right to a free home on a free soil; when I saw the flag of my country, the blessed old Stars and Stripes, turned against me, and waving over ruffians that were hunting me down for no other crime than because I had tried to be a refuge for the Lord's outcast ones. Nelson, you hain't got into the deep waters yet. 'If thou hast run with the footmen and they have wearied thee, then how wilt thou contend with horses? and if in the land of peace, wherein thou trustedst, they wearied thee, then how wilt thou do in the swellings of Jordan?' "

"I can't help it, Mr. Treworthy. Your blood was hot as mine once. Submitting to God's will is one thing, and submitting to injustice and fraud is another. There has been too much of this last kind. Why, if all the men who call themselves Prohibitionists had only voted according to their convictions we should have elected our man by a good majority."

"There ain't no reasonable doubt of that," placidly returned Mr. Treworthy.

"Well, it just makes me mad to hear Christian men talk about the evils of intemperance and pray, 'Thy kingdom come,' and then eat their own words by voting with rumsellers and distillers at the bidding of a party. It's the inconsistency of the thing I'm looking at."

"Don't you know," returned Martin Treworthy, leaning forward in his chair and giving the fire an extra poke, "that these good men believe all the while they are voting for temperance. They are humbugged and don't know it. 'He that letteth will let till he be taken out of the way.' There's a lying spirit abroad in the world, in the church, everywhere—an organized Satanic power that will either plant itself square in the way of every honest reform, or if it has got too strong to be stopped, checks and hampers it; puts a bridle round its neck and a bit in its mouth, covers it with fine trappings, and then rides on it just where it wants to go. Look at the Good Templars, started in 1851 when the temperance reform was thirty or forty years old, and had got too strong a grip on the hearts and consciences of the people to be shook off—who were its chief engineers? High Masons. And what has it done for temperance? Well, I'll tell you. It has humbugged a great many temperance folks into sitting with folded hands and trusting to the lodge to do their work for them; it has humbugged lots of others into joining, and then kept them busy with childish nonsense; it has humbugged thousands of Christian men and women into supporting secrecy as a principle; and in short it has been nothing else but a first-class humbug clear through."

Two and two make four—that is mathematics. Hydrogen and oxygen in certain proportions make water—that is science. Christ, and him crucified, is the power and wisdom of God for salvation—that is revelation. But how do you know? Put two and two together, and you have four—count and see. Put hydrogen and oxygen together and you have water—taste and prove. Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved—believe and thou shalt know. The last is as clear a demonstration as the others.

THE MODERN DRUIDS.

The United Ancient Order of Druids originated in England in the year 1781, and was introduced into this country in 1830. The membership in England is 50,599, in Germany about 1,500, in the United States (May 1, 1884), 14,139. The revenue of the American groves (or lodges) for the past two years was $372,426; relief paid by groves during the same period, $147,251.

The ritual has been considerably revised of late in this country. The degrees have been reduced from five to three, and all reference to religious matters carefully excluded,—no prayers, nor no mention of the name of God being tolerated. Immortality, however, and a future state of happiness is recognized in their funeral services. The society is quite a favorite one with Jews.

Illinois is the banner State, having a membership of 2,953.

The "Gorsedh" is another secret society of Druids which makes considerable pretension to medical and other professional attainments. A membership of 3,000 is claimed for the society in the United States.

REFORM NEWS.

FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

WISCONSIN BEFORE THE CONVENTION.

JANESVILLE, WIS.—As in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to his fellow, was verified on entering the home of Andrew Stevens and wife in this city last evening. Time brings its changes to forms material and temporal, but, "eternal," unseen conviction and purpose ripen and strengthen. Happy in the love of their offspring of the first and second generations, and established in the confidence of a large circle of friends, they do not regret the firm and open stand they have taken against the insidious enemy of Christ. They are living in comfort and are quietly finding out who among their neighbors are in sympathy with their views on secret societies, and have already learned that they are by no means alone. Mr. William Stevens and his estimable wife came in for a call, and though much occupied with business they are still full in the faith. I hope for a delegation from Janesville at the Milton convention.

SHARON, WIS., Jan. 12th, 1885.

The Lord was pleased to open the way and give me liberty of utterance in the M. E. church yesterday morning, and also at union services in the Congregational church in the evening. The week of prayer has been observed and it is designed to continue special efforts for a time. Knowing the purpose of the brethren, both services were conducted with reference to the situation. Pastors Anderson and Harris with several others took occasion to thank me for the remarks I had made, and by their kindness have put me under obligations which I cheerfully and gratefully acknowledge. May the Lord reward them. Bro. Walter Flansberge, an old-time resident of Sharon and a veteran M. E. member, spoke of former visits I had made to this place and said, "You have done a great wrong here, and according to your sermon you ought to make it right."

I said, "Certainly I ought to make all wrongs right so far as possible. But what is my offence?"

"You came here and sowed discord among brethren and nearly broke up the Lutheran church; and now you ought to make it right."

I assented to the discord and my obligation, but said, "I see no way to set this matter right but to hold a series of meetings in which the true character of Freemasonry and kindred orders shall be shown, and this is what I am ready to do."

The brother turned somewhat abruptly away with the remark: "We have had too much of that kind of talk already."

In a brief interview afterward I learned that Bro. F. lived in N. Y. State and was slightly conversant with the Morgan affair at the time it occured. He stated that he was not connected with any secret lodge, but was opposed to them; that he believed Masonry was wicked, etc., but thought I had injured the church by discussing it here. I asked if in his long experience he had ever known an instance where the devil was cast out of a church without roaring and if possible rending. I again renewed my proposal to come and hold a series of meetings in either of the churches, in which I would do my utmost to right any wrong I might have done. I sincerely hope Bro. Flansberge will secure for me a house and give me an early opportunity to vindicate my record in Sharon on this "vexed question." Since he has called attention to my fault, it seems to me his plain duty is to aid me in securing an opportunity to wright the wrong I have done. Will Bros. Hoard and Suidter co-operate in this matter?

HISTORY.

At a meeting in Delavan where Mr. Ronayne was mobbed, I met Bro. Van Alstine for the first time. He brought me to Sharon and introducced me to his pastor, Rev. Mr. Hammond. By his invitation I preached morning and evening to his people. Brethren interested also arranged for an afternoon union service at which all the pastors then in the village were, I think, present. I did not introduce the "vexed question," and escaped so far as I know, the censure of my brethren. Some desired me to lecture on Freemasonry and by my permission a meeting was announced to consider that subject on Monday evening, by one of the trustees of the church. Learning that pastor H. objected, I called with three of his official members, and failing to secure his consent, I declined to enter the pulpit over his protest and took the first train for Chicago. A good audience came at the time a ppointed I was told, and when they learned the situation were not pleased with the turn things had taken. Some blamed and others approved my course; but I have never felt that it would have been right to disregard the positive protest of the person occupying the sacred and responsible position of pastor.

While in Fond du Lac, a few years later, I received an invitation to address the Y. M. C. A. on the following Sabbath, and at once replied to the secretaries that, D. V., I would fill the appointment. Stepping from the train, I was informed that the M. E. minister declined to give the use of his pulpit unless I would agree not to discuss the lodge question. I replied, "I would rather sware into a Masonic lodge than a Masonic pulpit and should accept no such terms."

On Sabbath morning I attended and participated in the Y. M. C. A. prayer-meeting and accepted an invitation from the Free Methodist pastor to preach to his people. Bro. Case then tendered his pulpit, without restrictions, and I delivered an address to the young men in the Congregational church, where by request of the pastor, I preached again in the evening.

Arrangements having been made for lectures in the Free Methodist church on Monday and Tuesday evenings, with pastor Case's permission I made the announcement giving my subjects, and added the request that all who did not wish to hear what I had to say would stay away.

This was the inception of my anti-lodge work in Sharon and everything on my part was done openly and above-board.

In the nine public addresses given in all, in four different churches, I have discussed the "vexed question" but twice, and then full notice was given of my subject and a request made that everybody not wishing to hear what I had to say would stay away.

The above are the material facts. Having summarized and submitted the case, I now call upon any one to state wherein my "great wrong" consists. It it is not Christian—not even manly—to assail my reputation and then skulk behind "ancient usages and established customs" and shoot "fiery darts," from a concealed battery. I have neither been a robber of churches in Sharon, nor yet a blasphemer of the God whom all true worshipers adore, and it will not suffice to cry out. "Great is Diana" of the temple of the great "Hiram Abiff" whom all the initiated in Sharon and the world worshipeth, and by whose craft we have our wealth. Meet the case openly and on its merits. Please, gentlemen, accept this as a personal notice that I am more than willing to "right any wrong" I have done to the church or any of its members. Secure a place suitable in which to discuss this "vexed question" and if I fail to vindicate my course and prove that the lodge system is a compound of Baalism, blasphemy and heartless persecution, then accuse me of doing a "great wrong" when I presume to enter my protest against this dominant power in your town! Hoping you will soon favor me with an opportunity to make the wrongs I am said to have committed right, as per request of Bro. Flansberge, I am, respectfully,

J. P. STODDARD.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—At Galva I received most kind and pleasant hospitality from Dr. Dickinson, Mr. C. H. Brooks, and Rev. J. F. Borg of the Swedish Lutheran church. I lectured to his people on the evenings of the 10th and 11th inst., and though the nights were cold and stormy the congregations were good. On Sabbath evening the Free Methodists adjourned their meeting and attended at the Lutheran church, much pleased to find sympathy and co-operation in a reform for which they had endured reproach. A few Congregationalists, including their excellent pastor, Rev. C. C. Harrah, are with us, but owing to meetings in progress in their own church were not able to attend.

From here I went back to Kewanee on the 12th, and soon the hand of a sturdy Scotchman was laid on my shoulder and I was asked my name. I got into the carriage of Mr. D. McDonald, and after being thoroughly wrapped with robes was driven nine miles to the beautiful little village of Elmira, in Stark county. Here is a settlement almost wholly of Scotch people, with three Presbyterian churches: Canadian, General Assembly, and United Presbyterian. There is also an M. E. church. I lectured three times in Fuller's Hall, a fine room of large seating capacity. My discourse on the evening of the 12th was on intemperance, and prohibition as the remedy. It met with a hearty response.

On Tuesday and Wednesday I spoke on secret societies in their relation to Christianity and good government, and was glad to see good sized congregations come through the storm and give excellent attention. I was much indebted to Mr. William McBride for hospitality and aid, and also to Rev. Mr. McDiarmid of the Canadian Presbyterian church who kindly brought me through the drifting snows to Kewanee.

On Thursday the 15th I met a large audience in the Swedish Lutheran church of Altona. The pastor, Rev. Mr. Abrahamson, takes a warm interest in our reform. On the 16th I left for this place but in consequence of the deep snow did not get here till two o'clock A. M, insterd of nine of last night. The outlook is good. Yours in Christ,

H. H. HINMAN.

A WORD WITH KANSAS FRIENDS.

OLATHE, Kans., Jan. 15, 1885.

DEAR EDITOR:—Will you give me just a little space in your columns while I call attention to matters of interest in our own State?

We notice the commendable desire set forth in the Cynosure to send out fifty lecturers into the field to push the work of the N. C. A. Such a thing accomplished, would, with the blessing of the Spirit of Light, certainly result in vast good. We read with pleasure of the efforts put forth in the New England States, the zeal shown in Illinois by tried and true friends, and the preparation being made in Ohio to rally, organize and direct the forces of truth and light against the falsehood, deception and darkness of the lodge system.

In the days of Nehemiah the entire wall of Jerusalem must needs be built and repaired, yet each one will look with special interest at the progress in his own vicinity. May I not call the attention of the friends of reform in our own young State to our circular that we send forth, asking a careful consideration of the points presented in it?

Will you not give a hearty to our appeal for help? May we not bespeak for Rev. R. Loggan, the worthy brother whom we appoint and send out as our State agent, a warm reception when he may come to visit your place and labor for a little while among you? Will you not co-operate heartily with him in the work during his stay? and you may thus very greatly further the good cause, and help to exemplify the state of things to which Christ's teaching and example legitimately lead; he said, "I ever taught in the synagogue and in the temple whither the Jews always resort; and in secret have I said nothing" Yours for truth and for Christ,

W. W. MCMILLAN.

THE WATCH-FIRES KEPT AGLOW IN MISSISSIPPI.

COLUMBUS, Miss., Jan. 10, 1885.

DEAR BRO. K.:—I have not been making tents like the apostle Paul, but have been "laboring night and day" that I might "not be chargable to any." I have also preached the Gospel to the poor, distributed reform tracts, lectured some and talked reform from lodgery with a great many with whom I have met. Although so much time had to be spent in labor for support, the reform work has by no means ceased here. Others have delivered some lectures and a considerable number of tracts have been distributed by members of the Associated Churches of Christ and the Lowndes County Christian Association opposed to secret orders.

I wish to call the attention of prohibitionists to these facts. In almost every town the leading saloonists according to their own advertisements are members or officers of secret societies. The lodge power sustains the liquor traffic. Both must go down together. Let every prohibitionist look into these facts and see them for themselves. How surprising it is that many work in the temperance cause and pray and weep and die and never see that secret orders are the great enemies to their work. I never knew a Masonic lodge in which there was not one keeper of a "doggery" and others who helped him drink. It would be well to circulate prohibition tracts and anti-secret literature together.

I am thankful to our highly esteemed friend, G. W. Clark, for his remembrance of the work here by a contribution. In the beginning of the year 1885, I send a cheer to the workers all along the line. "For they have refreshed my spirit and yours." 1 Cor. 16: 18. "The work is great and large and we are separated upon the wall, one far from another. In what place, therefore, ye hear the sound of the trumpet, resort ye thither unto us: our God shall fight for us." Neh. 4: 19, 20. To those Christians who have not taken part in the work I would say, "Arise and be doing, and the Lord be with thee."

ELI TAPLEY.

FROM AN OLD FRIEND AND LECTURER

LEMASTERS, Pa., Jan. 6, 1885.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE:—I am holding a series of meetings at this place in the U. B. church, and am happy to say that there are encouraging signs of good in my intercourse with the people. I find that the members of secret societies are busy in the efforts to hoodwink the young men into their dens. I have found several who were already reading their by-laws and constitution preparatory to joining the Odd-fellows. I have given them a little counsel in regard to the inside workings of the lodge, and they, I think, have concluded to have no fellowship with their unfruitful works of darkness. I also heard of a young Mr. Webster, in a United Presbyterian family near Mercersburg, who is engaged in getting an education, and who intends to enter the lecture field and devote his time and talent in lecturing against organized secrecy. Thank God for such young men, for surely it is the Lord's doings, who knoweth that the harvest is great, and the laborers few, and in answer to many believing prayers he is thrusting laborers into the great field of anti-secrecy reform. I propose to do more in the future than ever before to keep our dear young people from entangling themselves in the halters, chains and cable-tows of the lodge. Yours in Christ.

CORRESPONDENCE.

AN EARNEST LETTER FROM TEXAS.

F. M. TABERNACLE,
SAN ANTONIO, Texas, Jan. 14, '85.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—I have been receiving your valuable paper for some time through the kindness of some unknown friend, and see that it is credited to me for a year. I wish to offer my sincere thanks to the sender, and may the Lord bless him a hundred fold.

We are struggling for an existence here in this Sodom of the South, "where Satan's seat is." I have no salary and receive but little from man, but God supplies all my needs, which are but few. I live in a tent as I have no means to rent a house, and I have no family but my wife, and get along very comfortably. We want to build a church and expect the Lord will furnish the means in due time. We have had some souls converted and sanctified, and others raised from beds of sickness in answer to prayer. All glory to Jesus be given. I preached on the platform of the Sunset depot within hearing of six or seven saloons, until I was forbidden the privilege. Now I preach in the street right at the door of the saloons. I preach against secret societies, saloons, beer-gardens, and all the popular sins of the day, and God gives us strength and grace to beard the lion in his den. Pray for us. Your brother saved,

WARREN PARKER.

REV. JACOB S. HARDEN, ODD-FELLOW.

Perhaps few of the readers of the Cynosure know or remember the remarkable case of poisoning that occurred in Warren county, New Jersey, in 1858. The subject was a preacher in the M. E. church, in his 22d year. The writer was personally acquainted with him, before his marriage. He lived but a few months with his wife, before he fell in love with a Miss Smith, who became the object of his care, and, as he saw no better way to get her than to murder his own wife, he succeeded in the third attempt. When the facts became known, and he was sworn, his testimony awakened the suspicion that he was the murderer of his young and handsome wife. The examination proved that he was the most godless villain that ever disgraeed the eountry. He was also an Odd-fellow. He naturally gravitated that way to find proteetion, and he was eloseted until after midnight with two men, whom I well knew, and then he was disguised and sent to Canada. It cost the eounty nearly one thousand dollars to arrest him, all in consequence of belonging to an order whieh teaehes the highest morality. His lodge brothers tried every way to save him, but after the second trial, New Jerscy justiee hanged him in July, 1859.

An order whieh elaims so mueh goodness must have some very elastie eonseiences. It is more than I ean comprehend how a Christian minister can asseiate with an order of men which has every elass of charaeter, and certainly cannot teaeh higher morality than Christianity does. The help they claim to give is often similar to the above. An order whieh stands between the eriminal and the law is not entitled to eommon respeet. LEVI KELLY.

TRIALS ABUNDANT AND LECTURERS SCARCE.

CLAYVILLE, N. Y.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—A year or more has elapsed sinee I have reported through your columns what I have been doing, and no doubt, most, if not all, of the reform brethren think I am doing nothing, beeause I say nothing. But I am fighting as best I ean this battle, all alone, I may say, as Bro. Nathan Green is eonfined to the house by sickness, and in all probability will never be better; and the seeretists, both Masons and Odd-fellows, seemed eombined to erush me. But hitherto the Lord hath helped me, and I know he will help me to be brave and true. I feel the inward girding of the Spirit as the eonfliet deepens. They threaten personal violenee and destruction to my business; but "He that is for me is more than all they that are against me." I may not eseape their fury. As my Lord had to drink the eup, it eould not pass from him, but an angel came to strengthen him, so may I be strengthened as I may need. I am a sore trial to the Masonic horde, because I add my personal testimony to the truth of the expositions, by Ronayne's Handbook, President Finney and other works and traets.

I was mueh disappointed that Bro. W. B. Stoddard did not call on me, when in Utica, N. Y,, only ten miles away, but I suppose he knew nothing of me. I have not been able to attend the eonventions, but hope to do so at no distant day. Mean time I would like to have some good Christian worker eome and help me set fire to this dark, lodge-ridden valley. I will do what I can to help him. I do not know about the support; he might be able to sell books and traets in abundanee. I will furnish a home and board free. and do what I can further. We are like the people of Macedonia, surrounded by darkness and sin. The week of prayer is hardly observed. The Odd-fellows have an installation and none of them are at chureh. O that some one would hear the eall, "Come over into Maeedonia and help us!"

TRIALS IN KANSAS.

EMPORIA, Kans.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—It is with pleasure that I write to inform you that the Cynosure is next to my Bible for good reading. I have taken it from its eommencement and shall continue while the good Lord spares my life, if I can raise the money. I am living within four rods of the railroad, and eight of the round house, and trying to keep boarders. When I began two years ago I was over-run with boarders, but taking the Cynosure and giving it a very prominent plaee for them to read they would look for more eongenial quarters. About nine out of every ten of the men belong to some secret society and "birds of a feather will flock together." Now the Lord is my shepherd; my trust is in him and he will provide. But even those that should be my best friends advise me to keep quiet and say nothing about seeret soeieties; but if all others forsake me God will not, and the truth must and will be told as far as I am able, for it is the foundation of my Free Methodist doetrine. While I live neither man or devil will prevent me from telling and distributing the truth presented in the Cynosure, and as fast as read I send the papers on their mission of sowing the seed in different plaees. I get some hard words and many thanks. My prayer is that the time may eome when all secret soeieties shall be banished from the faee of the earth; then peace and happiness would reign triumphant and all can shout a jubilee. I praise the Lord for salvation that saves from all sin while in this unfriendly world and will enable me to finally eome off more than eonqueror. ELBERT MARCY.

PITH AND POINT.

A VERY PROPER SENTIMENT.

I have an intense abhorrence of the blasphemy, arrogance and folly of Masonry, and desire to make some amends to my conscience and use my experience for the warning of others, as a secondary good which I got out of Masonry. God bless and prosper the work of the Cynosure.—JOEL SWARTZ, Gettysburg, Pa.

EARTHLY PARTING.

I shall ever desire to continue my name on the list of so worthy a cause as the Cynosure represents. May the great work which it has begun, live and grow in the hearts of the American people, and every Christian be led to see what an unrighteous course he is pursuing when he affiliates himself to the heathenish and idolatrous system which that ungodly institution of Freemasonry advocates.

Since my last communication, I have to add the sad intelligence of the death of my dear companion. She was in sympathy with me in this good work of reform. She died in the faith that Jesus was her Saviour, and in him was her implicit trust. We miss her, but it is her gain.—STEPHEN GROVER, East Boston.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR.

We had a pleasant beginning of the New Year, and I hope you also were blessed with genial skies and favoring gales as you launched forth upon the voyage of 1885! May your labors, your prayers, your hopes and expectations be richly rewarded throughout the new and current year upon which you have now so auspiciously entered. I think you are building greater than you know, and to be a builder in such a temple will be a greater honor some day than you dream of now.—GEO. W. CLARK, Detroit, Mich.

WHICH IS THE BETTER ANTI-MASON?

As the Cynosure seems to have abandoned its cardinal principle in advocating the election of a Freemason to the office of President, I have concluded to have my paper discontinued.—GEO. O. ROBINSON, Bloomington, Ill.

Thus a reputed Anti-mason, yielding to prejudice, stops the Cynosure, while the paper is received and welcomed in the home of the man he condemns, who also sends for extra copies for distribution.

WORKMEN UNITED IN LODGERY.

I have no novelty to report in the form of secret societies, but I will note for its future fame in railroad riots that Oneonta, N. Y., boasts in its press the inception of the association of railroad brakemen, which already includes 2,000 members. A lodge of United Workmen was recently instituted at Richfield Springs, N. Y., of which the postmaster, a Freemason, drawing a salary of $1,600 to $1,800, was elected to an important office. How he is entitled to the appellation of a workman is not apparent, but his interest and motive in assisting in the foundation of an auxiliary society to Freemasonry is obvious. The society meets in the basement of the Universalist church, the pastor of which is chaplain of the chapter and blue lodge. It is, therefore, fully under the patronage and guidance of Freemasonry.—T., Schuyler's Lake, N. Y.

BIBLE LESSONS.

LESSON V.—February 1, 1885.—Paul at Jerusalem. Acts 21: 15-26.

GOLDEN TEXT.—And when they heard it they glorified the Lord. Acts 21: 20.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. The Communion of Saints. vs. 15–20. The glad reception given to Paul and his companions brings before us an important lesson. The early church was unsectarian. Judaizing teachers and Gnostic heresies had caused in some cases a departure from their first faith, but no Chinese wall of denominational exclusiveness had yet been reared. These Judean Christians glorified God for the great work wrought among the Gentiles, rejoicing in it as the triumph of the church universal and not of any particular class or sect. Pharisees by birth and education, as most of them were, their example might put to shame many in our own day, who think they desire the spread of the Gospel, when in reality they only care to increase the power and influence of their own particular denomination.

2. The advice of the elders. vs. 20–26. This advice seems singular at first view, and it is certainly an open question whether Paul was justified in making such concessions to what he had himself called "the weak and beggarly elements" of Jewish bigotry and superstition. But we know that Paul had long before this adopted the principle of giving up to his weaker brethren in non-essentials—a principle which practiced among Christians would soon put an end to these dissensions on trifling matters that so often split churches and hinder the work of the Holy Spirit. He became all things to all men that he might win some. At the same time he tells the Galatians that he gave place, no, not for an hour to the "false brethren," who sought to force the right of circumcision on the Gentile convert Titus, and even withstood Peter himself face to face for his unworthy dissimulation at Antioch. The truest and bravest reformer is he who can make allowances for weak brethren without any sinful participation in their weakness. In reform work there is a special temptation to be severe on those who cannot see the evils we combat in the same light we do. They are blinded by prejudice, by custom, by blind self-will that refuses to see the light; but we must remember, as Paul reminds the Ephesians, we ourselves "were sometime darkness." Every reformer can recollect a time when he saw the truth, for which he was afterwards willing to give his life, dimly or not at all. Paul himself retained a very vivid remembrance of his own state of darkness when a Pharisee, zealous for every jot and tittle of the law of Moses and ready to persecute to the death these innovators on all the old and established institutions of Judaism. To this fact was owing, no doubt, that broad and generous charity, that compassion for the weak which gave his spirit so close a likeness to that of his Divine Exemplar.

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

Where are we taught the unity of the church? 1 Cor. 1: 12, 13; 10: 17; Eph. 4: 4–6. What is the ground of true justification? Gal. 2: 16. If we trust anything else what does Christ become to us? Gal. 5: 4. What then must be the effect of joining secret orders that promise salvation without him?

NOTES FROM PELOUBET.

"We took up our carriages." Carriages is here used in the old English sense of things carried, bearing the same relation to the verb "carry" that "luggage" does to the verb "lug," and "baggage" to the verb "bag."—Alexander.

"Mnason of Cyprus, an old disciple." The arrangement seems to have been made as the best course that could be taken to minimize the inevitable danger to which the apostle was exposing himself. In that house at least he might be sure of personal safety, and the men from Cesarea would form a kind of escort as he went to and fro in the city.—Plumptre.

"By his ministry." In the eight years since Paul had reported his work to James, and the church at Jerusalem at the great conference, in relation to the Gentiles, though since then he had made a brief visit to Jerusalem (Acts 18: 21, 22.) he had (1) made two long missionary tours; (2) revisited and strengthened the churches in Asia Minor; (3) he had carried the Gospel into Europe; (4) he had founded large churches in Philippi, Corinth, Thessalonica, and Ephesus; (5) he had been the means of great numbers of conversions, and the great extension of the Gospel; (6) some of the converts had been willing to endure much for the Gospel; (7) they had sent large contributions by Paul to the poor at Jerusalem; (8) special miracles had been wrought by the hand of Paul.—Peloubet.

"Thou seest, brother, how many thousands of Jews there are which believe." The Greek word rendered as "thousands" is even stronger, "myriads," or "tens of thousands." James was speaking not of the Christian Jews at Jerusalem only, but of that vast multitude which was in the habit of keeping the feast of Pentecost at Jerusalem. Of all the great Jewish festivals, Pentecost attracted the largest number of pilgrims from distant countries. We read in Acts 4: 4 that the number of "believers" in the city was about five thousand. This was twenty-four years back, and in the meantime Christianity had continued to spread.—Rev. Com. The remark emphasized the extreme danger of the apostle's position in that hotbed of raging fanaticism.—Farrar.

"That thou teachest all the Jews which are among the Gentiles," etc. Paul never taught the Jewish Christian to abandon the law and the customs of his fathers. He himself, on the contrary, on several occasions conspicuously observed the strictest rites of Judaism; as, for instance, when he shaved his head at Cenchrea, when he lived as a Jew with the Jews, when, as in the circumstances about to be narrated, he took upon himself the Nazaritic vow.—Schaff. What Paul did teach was that neither circumcision nor uncircumcision was of any consequence (Gal. 5: 6; 6: 15); that the uncircumcised need not be circumcised, and that the circumcised should not become uncircumcised (1 Cor. 7: 18, 19); that Jew and Gentile are alike guilty before God, and are saved only by the grace of God through Jesus Christ (Rom. chaps. 1–3).—Abbott.

"Have a vow on them." This vow corresponds with the vow of the Nazarite described in Num. 6: 1–21. The vow was either for life, as in the case of Samson and Samuel, or it was for a certain definite period. The customary period among the Jews was thirty days. The import of this vow appears to be that the Nazarite dedicated himself specially to the service of God His vow was a solemn act of self sacrifice.—Gloag.

"Entered into the temple to signify the accomplishment." Paul could do what he did with perfect consistency. (1) According to Paul's views, the ceremonies of the law were matters of indifference; hence he felt himself at liberty to accommodate himself to the conduct of others in these indifferent things. Christian love, which was the grand moving principle of his conduct, caused him to accommodate himself to the views of the Jews when he could do so without any sacrifice of principle, in order to remove their prejudices.—Gloag. (2) If there had been a shade of evil in the transaction, or any foreseen liability to the misleading of weak believers, St. James would never have suggested this course, and St. Paul would not have acquiesced in it.—Cook. (3) He had before done the same thing in a voluntary manner, when it could not be pretended that it was for double-dealing or imposition (chap. 18: 18).—Barnes.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile hands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.
2. That the Bible should be associated with hooks of science and literature in all our educational institutions.
3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.
4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.
5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.
7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.
8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.
9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.
10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.
11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.
12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.
13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.
14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.
15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

The Christian Cynosure.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, JANUARY 22, 1885.

ST. JOHN is as hard to "down" as Banquo's ghost. A good friend writes from Worcester, Mass., in reply to those who think we did wrong to vote for him: "We are walking in the pathway of success, and towards eternal felicity, when, and only when, we are in the way of the teachings of Christ."

THE NATIONAL PROHIBITION COMMITTEE MET in New York, Jan. 7th and 8th, about one hundred persons present. They resolved to pay money to keep St. John in the field, and that the Prohibition party make no compromise of its principles by coalition with any other political party. This does not mean the American party. They "make no compromise of their principles" by following Christ, who "spake nothing in secret."

"THE ABOMINATION WHICH MAKETH DESOLATE" (Dan. 12: 11.) meant idolatry injected into God's temple and worship. "Abominations" was the common name for idols. Take the concordance and see. "The abomination of desolation standing in the holy place" (See Matt. 24: 15.) means Satan's worship mixed with God's; or idols in God's temple. Mason-lodges holding funerals in Christ's churches are precisely these abominations; and they will make the United States as "desolate" as they have made the hills and valleys of Judea.

How? By filling the court-houses with secret oaths they will make the oath mean nothing; by putting conflicting oaths into men's conscience, till they know not which oath to keep, or what to swear by. Then some Jeff. Davis will get in the place of Grover C. Cleveland or J. G. Blaine, and seize the administration by tools of the lodge, with arms in their hands, and blood will flow over the prairies to the horse-bridles! May God help us in time.

SECRETARY STODDARD has suspended the circulation for names of the request for a call for a New England meeting, till he has seen and consults with brethren Capwell, Conant and Kimball, to whom he is now en route. We much regret the delay, but the co-operation of Capwell, Conant, and Kimball will be, in itself, a tower of strength. One year ago last fall Messrs. Pomeroy, Bailey, Ford, Hinman, Stoddard, Blanchard, Phillips, and Powers, met at Washington and voted for a New England meeting, believing that the future head-quarters of our reform; and we could never learn why or how it was dropped. Senator Pomeroy was born in New England, and used to be "hurrahed" in the streets as the future President of the United States. But when he went among Kansas politicians, he "fell among thieves," as St. John did afterward. The American has interviewed the chief magician of the ring, who now declares that THE KANSAS STATE REPUBLICAN PARTY NEVER WAS IN FAVOR OF PROHIBITION(!) and only voted it into the Constitution because forced to it by the party led by St. John. This is as we supposed, and have said all along. St. John was strangled by these same leaders, because they hated his prohibition, and wished to put him out of their way to the Senate, where the head sorcerer now is: and every one knows that St. John was singled out and run down by distiller's and brewer's money dispensed by Kansas secret societies. Will Senator Pomeroy or Prof. Bailey send us Senator Ingall's relation to the Masonic lodge? His morals we learned while in Washington. Read Proverbs 23: 17, 18, and look for the end.

MURDER FOR TRUTH-TELLING.

At Bellefontaine, O., a prominent citizen died who had for years been a saloon-keeper, an infidel, and a contemner of Christianity and Christian churches, avowing that Masonry was all the religion a man needed. He seems to have been an influential man, and when the town rocked with the Murphy temperance revival, he stood out boldly against it. At his funeral preachers, teachers, and editors united to honor his memory, which might have passed for respect to the living, had not his lodge and neighboring lodges profaned his funeral by the heartless, heathen display of their acacia or cedar boughs, "grand honors" and impious ritual, promising resurrection and eternal life, while despising Christ who is "the Resurrection and the Life."

Some sincere soul, feeling outraged at the bold hypocrisy of ministers of the Gospel uniting to deny that Gospel, arose like Gideon, when he cut down the grove of Baal, and like Gideon, too, in the night, and put up on fence-corners and shop doors a hand-bill expressing the accursed nature of false worship over the dead, and calling on ministers of the Gospel of Christ to turn from these vanities to the living God.

The handbill, which is a little too long to print, is vigorously written, "with an aching heart" for the surviving friends of the dead man—but the burden of it is to indict Masonic funerals as a blasphemous protest and denial of the Gospel of the Son of God.

If you read Judges 6: 30, you will see the howl which "the men of the city" set up when they found their Masonic wind-bubble pricked by this honest, earnest, truthful hand-bill. They set detectives on his track. The county papers, the Republican and the Index, hope they will let him off with "tar and feathers," but express the opinion that his life will be taken if he is found out! So the men of the city cried out for the life of Gideon, because he had assailed the idolatrous despotism which had ground down the liberties of the people.

One of these prints makes bold to say that "To attack the institution of Masonry in a fair and honorable manner is the privilege of any person." But the one grand charge on which both papers ring changes, is that the author of the band-bill did it, like Masons, secretly and in the night; and a jack-Mason writes, "The time chosen was that in which robberies, murders, arson, and the worst of crimes are usually perpetrated."

Now we ask these guardians of popular liberty at what time do Masons do the ordinary work of the lodge—and such work!

We respectfully appeal to these country editors, who cannot plead the pressure of the assassin-socialists of the cities, not to suggest and stimulate murder for writing hand-bills against idolatry. An Anti-mason may properly object to secrecy because Christ "in secret said nothing." But as partizans of the lodge, to suggest murder by lynching for issuing his hand-bill in the night, but shows your desire to put this sincere, but perhaps over-zealous man within easy reach of the mob! This is your language: "We would spare the poor devil's life, and let him off easy with a suit of tar and feathers. This, however, would not appease the popular fury in the case." And so your inference is, kill him! Are there no laws in Bellefontaine? Are the readers of these papers pagans? Must men be lynched for indiscretions and for truths?

Gentlemen, this work is lodge work, and the god of the lodge is "a murderer from the beginning."

We hope before this these American editors in the State of Ohio have retraced their precipitant steps to which they have been urged by lodge-men, whose oaths have made them familiar with cutting throats for telling truth. If not, we trust there is virtue enough in Bellefontaine to protect the throats of truth-tellers from the lodge.

THE CONDITION OF THE SOUTH.

"Every despotic system is twice cursed. While it exists it is responsible for all the misery it engenders; and when broken up, as it certainly will be, it is chargeable with all the horrors caused by its dissolution.—Sheridan in the Impeachment of Warren Hastings.

The Century magazine, the Independent, the New York Weekly Witness, and, indeed, the press generally, are writing up the state of the ex-slave States and particularly of the ex-slaves themselves. There is a general agreement as to facts. And while Northern writers evince anxiety to promote harmony and good feeling, Southern writers, like Dr. Haygood of Georgia and George W. Cable of New Orleans, show a laudable purpose, that, now slavery is gone, the ideas and usages which it produced shall die with it.

This Mr. Cable is a truly brilliant and profound writer. He says he is a son and grandson of slave-holders, of course a creole; and one would think that he has a tinge of the fated blood in his veins from his humane feeling toward the negroes. He says, "Nothing but the habit of enduring it, generations old, could make their condition endurable by men not in actual slavery."

"Every colored man gains unquestioned admission into innumerable places as the menial attendant of a white man, where he could not cross the threshold in his own right as a well-dressed, well-behaved master of himself." He cites from the Selma, Ala., Times the case of a negro minister, beaten and driven from the car where he had paid his fare, into what is called the dog-car, by brutal whites; and the paper says, with a leer of satisfaction, "The puzzle is to find who did the flogging."

He shows, too, that negroes are virtually excluded from juries, and fare in the courts as might be inferred from that fact. He saw, too, one hot night in September a young mother and child, neat and well-dressed, compelled to ride in the smoking-car, where were a chain-gang of colored convicts going to work in a coal mine; when, if the child had been white and she its nurse, she might have sat in whatever car she chose.

Speaking of colored convicts at work in coal mines, Samuel J. Randall recently visited the coal mines in Birmingham, Alabama. As a leading Democratic statesman, he was greatly lionized from station to station; and, as a zealous tariff protectionist made speeches against bringing down American free laborers to a level with the pauper laborers of Europe. When he got down 224 feet into the Birmingham coal mines, which he carefully scrutinized, he found there 700 colored convicts, leased by the State to the owners, and about twice as many laborers who were free; thus literally putting convicts and free laborers on a level. This shocked Mr. Randall's Democracy a little, till the owners of the mine assured him they had been constantly troubled with strikes for higher wages till they obtained these chain-gang laborers from the State, and now the fear of losing their places kept the free laborers contented with their wages. It will be recollected that both Republicans and Democrats, in the late election were loud in their condemnation of compelling free laborers to compete with convict labor. While in those Birmingham mines, Mr. Randall might have repeated to advantage some of his old labor-protection speeches; but he had evidently lost his notes.

To offset these painful reminders of the old slavery regime, there is a minority of good men and women in the South who are verifying the adage, "Times change and we change with them." All the principal religious denominations are warring on Southern illiteracy, colored and white. The Peabody fund is working as a stimulus as well as a fact. The forces of nature; the perpetual competition of free society; the rivalry of political parties creating a demand for colored votes and white protection of colored voters, and charity, these and ten thousand causes invisible, intangible and unrecorded are keeping Southern society, and all free society, indeed, in the condition of a kettle of water in process of heating, the surface layer of particles cooling and sinking, while the bottom layer is constantly rising to the top.

But there is one painful fact which fills one with forebodings for the future of the country, especially of the South: the universal silence on secret societies. So was it with slavery while our war was preparing. It was uncivil to speak of it in polite society unless to apologize or approve of it. But the lodge enjoys a universal monopoly of silence, broken only at long intervals by the American Missionary Association, and a few like bodies and presses, forced to say something by the pressure of the discussions inaugurated by the National Christian Association. And then the endeavor is to say just enough not to rouse the lodge and her children, but just enough to quiet conscience and prevent the loss of conscientious men. There is enough money paid into secret societies in the South to educate the child of every illiterate person there. The colored people in Washington city have more than one hundred secret "orders" of their own. There is a perfect craze to join secret societies and keep up the dues. Almost every colored man you meet on the street has paid from twenty-five to one hundred dollars for initiations, dues and fees. "The simple believeth every word;" and the colored people are simple. The ignorant are fond of "grand" titles and finery; and the colored people are ignorant. Human nature is gullible by sorcery; and the colored people are human. And this love of sorcery of which Rome is chief sorceress is not confined to classes high or low. The king of Dahomey worships devils outright, and O'Connell the Liberator always crossed himself at meals, and had his heart taken out of his body and sent to Rome when he died. Tricks, signs, grips, tokens, circles, classes, lodges, necromancies, or consulting the dead, the alchymies and astrologies of all ages, spring up from human nature fallen, as thorns and thistles from the ground which is cursed for man's sake. And when once a man has worshiped Satan in any one of these he is as hard to reclaim as a lost woman or a lewd man. Spiritual and literal whoredom are alike, and reciprocally resemble, parallel and blend with each other. Nothing but the blood of Christ received by repentance and faith can eradicate the one or the other. Every hamlet has its Jo Smith, and polygamy would not exist if there were no "unclean spirits" which are not recognized by anti-Mormons as factors in their case. And unless the American churches can be awakened to know and apply the Word of God to these evils, negroes will continue slaves and Mormons devil-worshipers; and that foul system of which all secret lodges and "orders" are aiders and abettors will set harems in every Southern city, and a seraglio in every valley in the Rocky Mountain States, and one of the political parties will have these people's votes. And when war comes, as come it always has and will, where a people forsake Christ and worship the devil, they will fight like the Turk, for ages haughtily termed "The sick man of Europe," yet defying the armies of the world and the progress of Christian civilization to extinguish the despotism of his bow-string, or wipe out his sergalio which stands on the Bosphorus, a gilded harlot, beckoning mankind to Mormonism, which means society without families, and men without rights.

A REMARKABLE LETTER:—Rev. Mr. Polk, whose letter we give below, just as written, is a member of the Odd-fellows, and one or two other secret orders. A gentlemanly colored man, who belongs to the same lodge with Mr. Polk, tells us that there are four colored lodges in Chicago; that they derived their charters from England; and that in the ten years since he joined them, these lodges have collected about, (not exactly) forty thousand dollars, from the colored people of Chicago! A bright and sensible young girl, with her sister eleven years old, and her mother, who are members of these secret sworn clubs, called "Western Light;" "Golden Gate;" and "Juvenile Temples," are all three members of Rev. Mr. Polk's society, more than half of whom have been sworn to secrecy in these dark dens. Mr. Polk's denial rests on the fact that they meet in a hall, not in the church building; which, of course, is worse for the poor children. O, the deceivableness of unrighteousness!

CHICAGO, Jan. 9, 1885.

To the Editor of the "Christian Cynosure." My attentun has just been called to a statement in your paper of Jan 8, in which you Stated that my church, had three Secret Societies in it. there is not a shaddo of truth in the Statement there is not, nor ever has been any such, Societies in the Providence Bapt Church of Chicago, We hope the next time you put us before the publick you will know of what you speak, Yours etc J W Polk Pastor of the Providence Bapt Churh

—A. H. Springstein, of Pontiac, Mich., expects soon to go to Gratriot county in that State to lecture against the lodge. His appointment is at Sumner, and he will be happy to respond to other calls from that part of the State.

—T. B. Arnold, publisher of the Free Methodist, and several Sabbath-school papers, has secured for the latter regular contributions from Miss E. E. Flagg, our talented reform-story writer, on the subject of secret societies. This excellent arrangement will popularize the arguments against the lodge with a large number of young readers, and is a valuable and attractive feature of these papers.

—Secretary Stoddard returned from Wisconsin State meeting last Thursday with greater hope for the success of reform work in that State than ever. The convention was well attended, especially the evening meeting, and agent Bancroft feels much encouragement, as the opposition of the authorities of Milton College, where the convention was first appointed, seemed almost fatal. Bro. Ronayne from this city, who has lately returned from a visit of several months in Canada, was also present, and made an address on Odd-fellowship, holding up the order before the mirror of the Scripture with all the old-time power with which he has electrified audiences through all the Northern States. The full report will be sent in for next week.

—Bro. Geo. T. Dissette writes from Sabetha, Kansas, of a visit from State lecturer Loggan, for whom a church had been engaged and from whom a lecture was expected. Bro. Dissette adds: "You will pardon me if I say that so far as this locality is concerned Bro. Loggan will have to be contented with a grip on the creature's tail, for since Father Blanchard split its head with the 'sword of the Spirit' we have sat up with the corpse so constantly that some time has elapsed since 'only the stump of Dagon was left to him.'"

—It is reported that Hon. Frederick Douglass, of Washington, is about to be endowed with a fnnd of $10,000 left him by Miss Attilia Assing, a wealthy lady who has lived long in Europe. The gift is in recognition of his work for the emancipation of the slaves. She also leaves him her library. It is also stated that Mr. Douglass is to be benefited by a life annuity on $10,000 as a part of a bequest of over $20,000 to the New York Society for the Prevention of cruelty to Animals, by the will of a lady of German birth, who recently met with a sad death in Paris. Mr. Bergh is named as the executor of the will.

—Bro. Tapley's letter from Mississippi deserves twice reading: once for the good news of the courageous reform work that is kept up under such repressing difficulties, and again for the testimony that liquor and the lodge are hand in hand as Dr. Bliss of Denver so ably argued in the address printed last week. Bro. Tapley's testimony is more important because the movement against the saloon has more relative strength in some parts of the South than in a large part of the North. Now that keen winds and biting frost remind thousands of our readers, while they sit by a warm fireside, to remember the poor, can there not be a little fund sent to Bro. Tapley, and to John G. Fee at Berea, and other Christian workers in the South?

—Among the literary curiosities that sometimes find their way into the Cynosure office is the first number of the Temperance Herald, issued at Ann Arbor, Mich., Nov. 19th, 1838. And who should be the editor and publisher of this pioneer temperance journal but our old friend, George W. Clark, the "Liberty Singer!" The pen which began forty-six years ago to assail the deadly liquor foe, our readers will confess has not lost its eloquence or power, as the columns of the Cynosure will testify. One note which urges that there should be a temperance tavern at Ann Arbor, reminds us of a family tradition. Dea. Selah Loomis, who died in 1872, in Kewanee, Ill., well along toward his ninetieth year, kept the first successful temperance tavern between Detroit and Chicago.

—We wish to introduce a good article on Good Templarism which may be expected by the Cynosure readers next week. Last October (23d) Rev. J. H. Gehring, one of our most valued writers, promised a sequel to the interesting experience with this order which he there gave. The reason for the delay which has occurred meantime, Bro. Gehring tells in the following note, which we know to be fact and which must appeal to the sympathy of every reader:

"I owe your readers an apology for the long interval between the promise and its fulfillment. Some of them, I am sure, are aware that I am one of 'Uncle Sam's' cripples—crippled, not in limb, but in health and intellect, and a constant sufferer from the effects of a severe injury to the spine caused by a rebel bullet, which a sharp-shooter sent clean through the back of my neck, from left to right. Nervous debility and frequent attacks of severe pain—threatening paralysis—have so far disabled me that I am at times utterly unfit for any kind of mental work. An unusually severe spell of this kind has been the cause of my long silence. This is my explanation and apology; which, by the way, may be put down as answering for probable future occasions. Every mental effort causes me pain; hence, the Cynosure readers will hardly need the assurance that these letters are not the overflowings of an ambitious brain, but the manifestations of a sincere desire to testify for the truth, and to aid a cause which I believe to be approved of God."

EDUCATIONAL.

Prof. Benjamin Silliman, of Yale College, the eminent chemist, died Wednesday night of last week.

—Rev. Charles F. Thwing, pastor of a Congregational church at Cambridge, Mass., has been asked to accept the presidency of Iowa College at Grinnell.

—The faculty of Wheaton College have issued a card showing the total attendance this term to be 200. There are eleven instructors. In the Theological Seminary there are nine students. The spring term opens March 18th.

—Gates College, Neligh, Neb., has issued its first catalogue, which shows a good degree of prosperity for an institution which has but a few years taken the place of emigrants' dug outs and prairie dogs' burrows. The total attendance is entered as 130. The three preparatory classes are full and the first freshman class was begun this year. Rev. M. L. Holt, A. M., a graduate of Wheaton in 1876, is president, and with him are associated four teachers. Among the excellent rules for the government of the students is the prohibition of secret societies Gates College is mainly supported by Congregationalists, and has begun a hopeful career in a thriving community which has everything in the future.

—In the North American Review for November E. E. Hale proposes that, while the schools are kept open through the year as at present, each scholar be sent but half the time, leaving opportunity for instruction in home duties, business affairs and other practical matters. This was suggested by Luther long since, who wrote that children should be kept in school only two hours a day and the rest of the day be spent at home in a useful way.

—The Harvard College faculty have proscribed football by a vote of 24 to 5. The College club is forbidden to engage in any more inter-collegiate games.

—The catalogue of Oberlin College reports 36 in the department of theology, 206 in the classical course, and 1,314 students in all departments, including preparatory and musical schools.

LITERATURE.

The English Illustrated Magazine for January is a profusely illustrated number. The various occupations of the French peasantry of Calvados furnish the subject for an entertaining article with a number of engravings from original drawings. "Shakespeare's Country" adds much to the value of the magazine both in text and engraving. The plan of the publishers to devote so much of the magazine to serial stories detracts much from its popularity.

Alden's Juvenile Gem, is the title of a new illustrated weekly paper for young people, the publication of which begins with the new year. It is a new departure of the prolific "Literary Revolution" and will therefore be examined with particular interest by some humdreds of thousands of readers who have come to look to that enterprise almost exclusively for their reading matter. Its subscription price is only 75 cents a year, though it will rival the high priced magazines in the amount and quality of its attractions. A specimen copy will be sent to any applicant forwarding his address by postal card to the publisher, John C. Alden, 393 Pearl street, New York.

The Converted Catholic commences the second year of its publication with many interesting articles. It is a handsome monthly of 32 pages, devoted to the enlightenment and conversion of Roman Catholics —a much needed work. The January number includes in its contents reports of the Reformed Catholic Mission work in New York, Brooklyn and Newark, showing gratifying progress. The conversion of priests, one in New York and another in Scotland, besides other converts from Rome, Celibacy and Morality, Was the Apostle Peter ever in Rome? Father Chiniquy's Persecutors, a Sermon by Rev. Dr. John J. Casey of Montreal, himself a converted Catholic, The first of the Second Series of Father O'Connor's popular Letters to Cardinal McClosky. and a continuation of Rome Pagan and Papal, Father O'Connor, who was for many years a Roman Catholic priest, conducts it with sound judgment. The subscription is only $1.00 a year. Address, James A. O'Connor, 60 Bible House, New York.

Babyhood is a new magazine, not for the little ones directly, but their mothers. It is devoted to giving good advice for the care of little children. Every important topic relating to their physical existence will be discussed in its pages by able writers. Marion Harland and Dr. Leroy M. Yale are the editors. Mothers will do well to send 15 cents to 18 Spruce St., New York, for a specimen copy.

In his article on "Shiloh," which will appear in the February Century, General Grant describes the anxious night after the first day of that battle. He says: "The rain fell in torrents, and our troops were exposed to the storm without shelter. I made my headquarters under a tree a few hundred yards from the river bank. My ankle was so much swollen from the fall of my horse the Friday night preceding, and the bruise was so painful, that I could get no rest. The drenching rain would have precluded the possibility of sleep, without this additional cause. Some time after midnight, growing restive under the storm and the continuous pain, I moved back to the log-house on the bank. This had been taken as a hospital, and all night wounded men were brought in, their wounds dressed, a leg or an arm amputated, as the case might require, and everything being done to save life or alleviate suffering. The sight was more unendurable than encountering the rebel fire, and I returned to my tree in the rain."

Mormonism is about to find an authoritative annalist in Mrs. Ellen E. Dickinson, a relative of Solomon Spaulding, from whose stolen manuscript the "Book of Mormon" was constructed. Mrs. Dickinson has had access to family papers and other sources of information hitherto unknown. Joseph Cook speaks most warmly of her and her work.—A Brief History of Mormosism.

—American missions in West Africa are restricted and crippled in their operations by the fact that, wherever French colonies are established, it is the policy of the government to exclude all English influence in the schools, by requiring that the instruction be given in French. It is not against Protestantism, but against British influence, as promoted by the use of the English language, that these restrictive measures are directed. It has been proposed that French Protestant missionaries be employed at these stations; and it is also suggested that the missions affected be transferred to French Protestant societies, to which stipendiary grants shall be be made.

THE HOME.

A MOTHER'S REVERIE.

In the quiet of my chamber,
When the daily tasks are o'er,
And the voices of the children,
Hushed in sleep, resound no more,
Comes the question, oft repeated:
"What this day have I divined
Of the vast and wondrous workings
In the kingdom of the mind?"

What great thoughts have filled my vision,
Fired my soul with purpose high—
From the wells of hidden knowledge
Have I drawn a rich supply?
And my restless spirit answers,
In its unfulfilled desire,
Vainly have its baffled pinions
Sought the heights it would aspire.

In the lowly vale of duty
Have I trod the way along,
Pausing not to cull the flowerets,
Nor to hear the wild-bird's song.
For life's burdens—be they light or
Be they heavy—must be borne,
And the rest is not till evening
From the tasks begun at morn.

Yet, O patient, tired mother,
Is there naught to cheer thy toil?
Canst thou not some treasures gather
From the rich and fruitful soil
Of the garden where thou plantest,
Which shall aid thy downcast eyes
To look upward to the summits
Of thy higher destinies?

Ah, thou hast a mission holy:
To instruct the mind of youth,
And to sow the seeds of goodness,
Which shall bloom in love and truth.
Thou canst lead the tottering footsteps
By thy gentle, guiding care,
O'er the rough and thorny pathway,
Till they reach the golden stair!

Thou art working out a poem
Grander than the "bards' sublime,"
Which shall live in glowing numbers,
Far beyond the bounds of Time;
For the song, though feebly chanted
'Mid life's dark and toilsome way,
Angel voices shall re-echo
Through the realms of endless day!

THE MODERN ASSAULTS ON HOME-LIFE.

God's plan is to set the human race in families. The devil's purpose, persistently pursued, is to break down the family relation. Where the family is at a discount, pure morality and religion are at a discount.

The family relation is now assailed directly and indirectly from many quarters in this country. Mormonism is a direct and daring assault upon the very foundations of marriage. It is an open declaration of war against Christian civilization. It is a leprosy thrust into the social life of the nation. It is spreading. There are millions of persons in this nation whose sentiments concerning marriage are already lowered by familiarity with this Mormon abomination. The disgust naturally felt toward the beastliness of polygamy has to a large extent been blunted by this familiarity.

The "Club" life of our cities is in flagrant opposition to family life. The unmarried men who "club" together with their high living, their liquors and wines, their cards and their billiards, and their concomitants inside and outside of these palaces of luxury, thus expose themselves to peculiar temptation and disqualify themselves for the right enjoyment of home life. We do not make the reckless assertion that all "club" men are vicious; but we do assert that such a life is unwholesome and likely to result in moral deterioration to every man who gives himself up to it. All such are practical enemies to God's institution of marriage. There are thousands of married men who spend their leisure time at the "club" instead of their homes, who live in a different social world from that of their wives and children. With the increase of the "club" spirit, and dimunition of the home spirit, there is loss of domestic purity and happiness, and multiplication of divorces, with all the sad and shameful accompaniments of sin, disgrace and family ruin.

Then there is a vast army of men, married and unmarried, who are practically homeless. Commercial travelers, agents for almost everything that is made and sold, live on the road and in the hotels. They make occasional "calls" at the houses where their families live, and that is about all. The married men among them have little to do with the government and training of their children. The ties that bind them to that sacred circle are too often weakened and broken, and they fall into sin. The special perils that threaten unmarried men who are practically homeless need not be mentioned. Their position is so perilous that only such as are most strongly fortified against temptation can be considered safe. As business is now conducted, it may be necessary that a large body of men shall be thus kept on the road; but a Christian man who takes to this life ought to watch and pray much. And when the way is open for him to do so, he will do well to get out of it as quickly as possible. When a man is willing to live in continual separation from the wife whom he has sworn to love, cherish, and protect, and from his own children, Satan has already a mortgage on him. An exceptional case may exist here and there, but of them we do not speak.

The increasing disposition among married people to herd in hotels and boarding-houses is another symptom of the decay of home-life among us. Though sometimes necessary and often convenient, it is an unnatural and unwholesome mode of living. It is bad for the parents and worse for the children.

The decay of public morals follows the decay of the family life of the nation. Keep the homes of the land pure, and no amount of mal-administration of public affairs will suffice to ruin the country. Let the demoralization of our home-life go on, and all the statesmanship of the world would not be able to avert national disgrace and disaster.—Nashville Chr. Adv.

THE WISDOM OF SOLOMON.

Mrs. Wallace looked up from the work over which her needle was rapidly flying, and for one astonished moment let her hands fall in her lap, while her indignant eyes flashed at her cousin.

"Jennie Carter you must think I am an idiot; you are always triumphing over me with your Bible quotations, but I'm not such a goose as to accept that for inspiration; it doesn't even sound like Scripture."

Jennie laughed in her quiet fashion, and reached for the Bible from the table near her.

"It is Scripture nevertheless, and I call it excellent philosophy, if it did come from Solomon."

"O, Solomon! Well, one never quite knows whether he is talking from the standpoint of the preacher or the man who set himself to know madness and folly."

"Listen," said Jennie, "you shall have the exact words: 'Also take no heed unto all words that are spoken, lest thou hear thy servant curse thee; for oftimes also thine own heart knoweth that thou thyself likewise hast cursed others.' "

"Let me see it. Well, it certainly is there, but I never would have believed it."

"And don't you see," said Jennie, "that having counseled ue sometimes to shut our eyes and ears to unpleasant things as the most comfortable way of getting along, the wise man enforces his argument by appealing to our own consciousness of its justice. How many things have you said and thought in your heart that would condemn you if they were proclaimed."

"But think of that shiftless, slatternly Norah telling Bridget that I was crosser than forty bears, and an angel from heaven couldn't suit me!"

"She was only expressing her opinion of you to her friend, just as you were telling me your opinion of her."

"She is shiftless and slatternly—"

"And you are an admirable house-keeper, but a little inclined—"

Jennie paused, and Mrs. Wallace laughed but colored uncomfortably, as she said frankly,

"Yes, I know I am not amiable; I feel strongly and so I speak strongly. Words often seem to me entirely inadequate to express my feelings."

"But suppose you did not express them?"

"Not when I see Norah stirring her omelette with a new silver spoon, using a china cup to measure butter in, and a tea towel for a holder? Just wait till you are a mistress of a house, my lady."

"Do you remember Aunt Kate's way, and how many years she managed that crotchety Mary? Her girls used to say she had eyes in the back of her head, but this was the way she used them: She would find occasion to do something about the stove, and say, 'Bring me a holder, Mary! I won't spoil your nice towels;' or, 'That was a nice omelette you made this morning, Mary, but don't you think it tasted of silver?' And when Mary fairly started for one of her hurricane days, Aunt Kate just kept out of the way and pretended not to notice that anything was wrong."

"That may do with servants, perhaps, if any one has the grace, but when it comes to children you must notice their faults."

"Not always; it seems to me if I were pretty sure my children meant to do right I should not be too careful to inquire whether they succeeded in every instance. I declare to you, Melly, I have seen children in beautiful Christian homes whom I pitied as sincerely as I do the heathen on our streets, and who seem to me to have no chance of growing up with any adequate conception of right and wrong."

Mrs. Wallace murmured something about old maids' children, but her cousin went on:

"They lived in perfect terror of transgressing some law or calling down in some way a rebuke; they seemed to be always doding a reproving glance or a word of criticism, just as the others dodge an expected blow. It seemed to me inevitable that they must either grow up utterly callous to reproof and disapproval, or become habitually deceitful and hypocritical."

Mrs. Wallace, whose eyes were always alert, started up, exclaiming sharply,

"Now there goes Arthur straight across the lawn, and I charged him to keep off the wet grass."

"Wait a minute, Melly," begged her cousin; "don't you hear the band? The little fellow thinks of nothing but the music; he is not disobeying, only forgetting. Suppose you don't see him this time."

Mrs. Wallace frowned a little, but sat down, and in a few moments her little boy came in with glowing ing cheeks and sparkling eyes, wild with delight at the music and gay uniforms. It would have been a hard heart that could have resisted his enthusiasm, and Mrs. Wallace only said with a smile,

"You're mamma's own boy for music, but don't forget about the grass; it is very wet after the rain."

"O mamma," said Arthur, looking regrettfully at his feet, "I didn't think about the grass, I was in such a hurry. I'm so sorry."

"Never mind now," said his mother. Mamma knows you meant to remember, and she'll excuse you."

"Nice mamma," said Arthur, patting her cheek as he ran away.

"Jennie," said Mrs. Wallace after a moment of silence, "Solomon was right. Do you know what I was going to do? I was going to call Arthur straight back and make him sit down in his chair half an hour for disobeying me. We should both have been angry, and ten to one I should have had one of my regular battles with him. I declare," she exclaimed, biting her lips, "there he goes on the grass again."

But the little fellow only took one impulsive step towards the playmate who was calling him, and then turned quickly and went by the long circuit of the gravel-walk.

"There," said Jennie, "I call that obedience."

"I'm going straight down to praise Norah for the way she has polished the brasses, and if I find her raking out cinders with the carving-fork I'll hold my peace until some other time. Haven't I just snipped off a whalebone with my embroidery-scissors to save myself going up stairs for a penknife?"

Mrs. Wallace went to the kitchen humming the march the band had played, and her cousin laid away the Bible, saying with an amused laugh, "Wise King Solomon."—Emily H. Miller, in Christian Weekly.

A DOLL'S MISSION.

Some time ago, two little girls living in Troy sent a large wax doll, whom they named Gracie, to the "Bible and Fruit Mission," with the request that it might be loaned at different times to children in Bellevue Hospital "who did not want to see the doctor, or who felt badly about taking their medicine." So Gracie has taken up her residence inside those gray stone walls which shelter the poor sick people of New York, and every now and then she pays a visit to the children's ward.

One day, it happened that there were only boys in the ward where Gracie was taken, but one little fellow, whose bandaged legs told the story of his being there, held out his arms longingly for the doll. His radiant face and the gentle touch of his thin fingers told without words the happiness of possession, and the sighs of pain and weariness ceased for a time. Gracie's pink cheeks and blue eyes, her long white dress and flannel sack were examined by a dozen pairs of curious eyes. All the little boys in the room who were able to move about gathered around the bed where Gracie held her court, encircled by Georgie B.'s loving arms. For more than an hour the children played with the lovely doll, and when she was carried away, each one begged to shake her pretty hand, and showers of kisses were thrown to her as she disappeared.

Did the little girls, whose thoughtful kindness gives repeated happiness to the children of Bellevue, think of those wonderful words of our Saviour which make a service done for "one of the least" as if it were done for Jesus?—Alice M. Kellogg.

EVERY DAY.

Give us this day our daily bread:
If but a loaf made sweet by toil—
Though manna, angel-sown, be spread
No more upon this earthly soil.
Not less shall be the strength bestowed
By Providence our constant stay;
Not less shall gratitude be owed
For homely fare of every day.

Ours be the humble fireside light—
The constellations blaze afar,
Great passions blind, and sear, and blight,
We cannot warm us by a star.
The lowly hearth-fire suits us best;
For this we ever more will pray,
And love that keeps the heart at rest—
The patient love of every day.

Yet every common blessing seems
Of higher good the sign and pledge;
The evening planet floats and dreams,
Above the mountain's rugged ledge;
So treasuries above are filled
With gifts that will our prayers obey;
And tender benedictions gild
The care-worn brows of every day.

LIVES OF CELEBRATED WOMEN.

ELIZABETH FRY.

The story of a noble consecrated life cannot be told too often, and so we welcome in the Famous Women Series, the life of Elizabeth Fry. The other women of the series, including George Eliot, Emily Bronte, and Margaret Fuller, have been famous for their intellectual and literary gifts. But this Quaker lady who was honored by kings and whose name is known the world over, owes her fame to the greatness of her heart and the power of her self-abnegation.

Elizabeth Gurney was born in Norwich, England, a little over a hundred years ago, of a family of Quaker descent, but so liberal that the children studied music and dancing. She early showed that spirit of benevolence that was in its full development to accomplish such grand results, and though a gay society-loving girl, her heart was often in unrest, though in her journal she confessed to a fear of religion, as she "never saw a religious person who was not enthusiastic."

But worldly pleasures could not long satisfy her higher nature, and, led by the teaching of William Saverly, an American friend, she renounced fashion and gaiety, and, taking a more advanced stand than her family, adopted the strict tenets of the Quakers, finding therein an abiding peace. When a little more than twenty, she was married to Mr. Fry, a wealthy Quaker merchant of London, becoming a most faithful wife and devoted mother to her family of twelve children.

Still, in the midst of her home cares and duties, she found time to minister to the sick and poor around her, visiting them at their homes and conducting schools for their children. Some years later the "inward voice" led her to "bear testimony" in the meetings, and though her sensitive spirit for a long time shrunk from the Cross, at her father's death-bed she was moved to utter her voice in public, and was from that time known as a "preacher" among her sect, who have no "paid ministers," and whose preaching by women as well as men is always and only at the prompting of the Spirit.

Thus step by step was she being led towards the remarkable work which awaited her, and in 1813 we find her making her first visit to Newgate Prison, that was to prove the field of her wonderful labors.

It is difficult for us in these humanitarian days to realize the condition of prisons in the beginning of this century. True, John Howard had thrown the strength of his noble soul into the effort for their reformation, and something had been accomplished, but still the misery to be found there was appalling. For at this time some three hundred crimes were punishable with death, and into these foul prison-pens were thrust together the tried and the untried, the innocent and the guilty, forming a terrible aggregate of vice and suffering. The woman's division of Newgate contained over three hundred, so depraved and abandoned that the governor of the prison entered it with reluctance. And it was in this prison that in 1817, Mrs. Fry, who in the interval since her first visit had been led through a preparation of sickness, suffering and loss, commenced the labor that ended only with her life—a labor that the prison authorities deemed hopeless and her best friends Utopian.

It is a deeply interesting story, the history of her efforts among these degraded women, whom first reaching through their love for their children, she led along step by step till that pandemonium of disorder had been transformed into an assemblage of quiet, orderly, industrious women. Not that this work was accomplished easily or quickly. It was the slow result of persistent and long-continued faith and patience and labor on the part of Mrs. Fry and the band of willing helpers who gathered around her. Nor were their efforts confined to the prison. The convict ships and the welfare of the women convicts, not only during their passage, but after their arrival at the colonies, became an object of her care.

At first Mrs. Fry's work was almost unknown, but as it grew it attracted public attention till the quiet Quakeress found herself a noted woman, with all that implies of misrepresentation and praise, of detraction and flattery. Honors awaited her. She was invited to visit the Queen, a committee of the House of Commons on Prison Reforms sought her views and the result of her experience; but amid it all she walked, the same pure and sincere nature, and not content with what she had accomplished, constantly widened her philanthropic labors, till from Newgate they extended to all the prisons of England and Scotland, and then to personal visits and work for the prisons of Continental Europe.

Everywhere she went she was received with distinguished consideration. More than once was it her privilege in the presence of royalty to plead for the outcast and criminal, and to implore the same Divine mercy for the king on his throne that she had for the prisoner in his cell. She was the friend of all, from the lowest to the highest Kings and princes were numbered among the guests at the modest home of her later life. People of intellect and rank from every country sought her society and advice, and her influence modified life for the prisoner and the insane even in Russia.

In the meantime her personal life, the home life, beautiful with its spirit of loving devotion, was often clouded; several of her children married out of the Society, ever an occasion of grief to her faithful heart. Her husband became involved in financial disaster, entailing great perplexities and the loss of their cherished and handsome home, and, as if to add to the accumulation of sorrows, death entered again and again the circle of her family and immediate friends. And then came failing health and gathering age; but still in misfortune, sorrow and weakness, her interest in philanthropic work never flagged. And while she is most widely known for her efforts among prisoners and for prison reforms, she was at the same time constantly and actively engaged in many other enterprises, prominent among them being homes for discharged female criminals, including a school for discipline for destitute children, the District Visiting Society, for the relief of distress and encouragement of industry and frugality among the poor, the establishment of libraries for the men of the Coast Guard Service, a work involving a great deal of care and labor; the Servants' Society, for the help of domestic servants, and last, but not least, the "Nursing Sisters," an order of trained nurses; and all this beside her continuous service as a minister of the Society of Friends.

But the long, eventful, and busy life was drawing to a close, and having crowded the work of many ordinary women into the seventy-five years alloted her, on October 13th, 1845, the soul of Elizabeth Fry passed to its heavenly reward. But though dead she still speaketh, exhorting all women by her example to a holy purpose and unselfish living, and though it may be given but few to see their labors so signally crowned with success and honors, yet if our daily waking thoughts were like hers, "How best I might serve my Lord," the gladness of consecration and the peace of His presence would be our ever present reward.

A wonderful life! And that is beautifuly described by Hannah More, as of "heroic zeal, Christian charity, and persevering kindness to the most forlorn of human beings. They were naked, and she clothed them; in prison, and the visited them; ignorant, and she taught them; for His sake, in His name, and by His Word, who went about doing good."—Christian Intelligencer.

TEMPERANCE.

THE LIQUOR BUSINESS.

A portion of a temperance sermon by the Rev. Lyman Beecher, in 1827, reads thus:

"Can we lawfully amass property by a course of trade that fills the land with beggars, and widows, and orphans, and crime; that peoples the grave-yard with premature mortality, and the world of woe with the victims of despair? Could all the forms of evil produced in the land by intemperance come upon us in one horrid array, it would appall the nation and put an end to the traffic in ardent spirits. If, in every dwelling built by blood, the stones from the wall should utter all the cries which the bloody traffic extorts, and the beam of the timber should echo them back, who would live in it? What if in every part of the dwelling from cellar upward, through all the halls and chambers, babblings and contentions and vice and groans and shrieks and wailings were heard day and night? What if the cold blood oozed out and stood in drops on the wall; and by preternatural art, all the ghastly skulls and bones of the victims destroyed by intemperance should stand upon the walls in horrid sculpture within and without the building. Who would rear such a building? What, if at eventide and at midnight the airy forms of men destroyed by intemperance were dimly seen haunting the distilleries and stores where they received their bane or following the track of the ship engaged in the commerce, walking upon the waves, flitting athwart the deck, sitting upon its rigging, and sending up, from the hold within and from the waves without, groans and loud lamentations and wailings! Who would attend such stores? Who would labor in such distilleries? Who would navigate such ships? Oh, were the sky over our heads one great whispering-gallery, bringing down among us all the lamentations and woe which intemperance creates, and the firm earth one sonorous medium of sound bringing up around us from beneath the wailing of the damned whom the commerce in ardent spirits had sent thither; these tremendous realities assailing our senses, would invigorate our conscience and give decision to our purpose of reformation. But these evils are as real as if the stones did cry out of the wall, and the beam answer it; as real as if night and day wailings were heard in every part of the dwelling, and blood and skeletons were seen upon every wall; as real as if the ghostly forms of departed victims flitted about the ship as she passed over the billows, and showed themselves nightly about stores and distilleries and with unearthly voices screamed in our ears their loud lament. They are as real as if the sky over our heads collected and brought down about us all the notes of sorrow in the land, and the firm earth should open a passage for the wailings of despair to come up from beneath."

FOOTPRINTS OF THE TRAFFIC.

[From the Wayne Co., O., Herald.]

A most bloody murder came to light in Akron on last Friday through the death of Mrs. Watt Henry, whose husband keeps a saloon in the Sixth Ward in that city.

As soon as Mrs. Henry was dead, stories of the most fiendish treatment on the part of the husband were circulated, Mrs. Barlow, residing next door, stated that last Thursday morning upon entering the Henry house she found Mrs. Henry lying across a a bed, her clothing spotted with blood, the room looking more like a slaughter-house than otherwise. Mrs. Henry had recovered consciousness, and said to Mrs. Barlow that Henry had come home drunk during the night, and after knocking her down without cause, pounded and kicked her. During the terrible treatment she lost consciousness, and when she revived she was almost frozen to the floor in a pool of her own blood. The devil of a husband had fled. Since that time the few people who knew of the affair have been afraid to speak. At the inquest last Friday it was found that the fleshy part of the head, face, breast, arms and left side of body and left leg were literally mashed into a pulp, and that the left wrist was dislocated. Three ribs on the left side were broken from the breast bone. The liver was lacerated and the brain showed marks of violence. Strong men who looked upon the sight were moved to tears, while the passions of others were so terribly wrought up that the devil in human guise who did the act would have been hung to the nearest lamp-post had he not been lodged behind the prison walls, where he is awaiting trial. This was not the first time Henry had treated his wife in a eruel and inhuman manner. Frequently when under the influence of drink he had kicked and pounded her in a brutal manner and threatened to kill her. This is one of the legitimate results of the drink traffie which is tolerated by the Christian voters of this State. Every such voter who easts his ballot to perpetuate this traffic by lieense or taxation laws is responsible in a measure for the murder of this woman. Who wants such a responsibility upon their head?

THE CHURCHES.

—Rev. Robert Patterson of the Presbyterian church, Oakland, Cal., died Saturday. He was formerly pastor of the Jefferson Park Presbyterian church in Chicago, and was well known and highly esteemed in this city. To the country at large he was best known by his writings in defense of Christianity, his work, "Fables of Infidelity and Faets of Faith" having a very large sale.

—A monument to commemorate the labors of David Brainard, the missionary to the Indians, has been erected on the site of his log eabin in Warren Co., Pa., and dedicated by the students of Lafyette College.

—The North Carolina Wesleyan conference at its late meeting adopted the following among other resolutions: "Further, we believe all secret oath-bound organizations to be contrary to the teachings of the Word of God; and consequently anti-Christ in their nature. We reeommend that they be discountenanced by our people."

—Among the delegates eleeted by the United Brethren eonferenees to their General Conferenee to meet in Fostoria, Ohio, next May, are a number of men who will be faithful to the true principle represented in the law and the tradition of the denomination. Among them may be noted: Milton Wright, Halleck Floyd, David and Daniel Shuck, Wm. Givens, L. Bookwalter, S. Mills, Wm. Dillon, J. L. Luttrell and P. B. Lee.

—About forty of Rev. William Taylor's missionary workers will sail for Africa on January 22. A friend has given $1,000 to purehase property at St. Paul de Loando, the port of entry, and others have contributed building materials and breadstuffs.

—The reign of anarchy in Zululand has made sad havoc with the mission work in that unhappy land. Revolution has followed upon revolution, until now a sort of a republic has been established that has some promise of a permanent existence. The Hermansburg Society has been laboring for decades with considerable suceess among these gifted people, and the unsettled state of affairs was used by the enemies of the mission work to destroy the harvest of years. Not only was missionary Sehroeder most eruelly murdered, but eleven stations were burned and destroyed, while the missionaries and the converts were compelled to flee. Many of the native Christians were also murdered. The exiled missionaries are waiting for a favorable opportunity to return to their posts of duty.

—It will be remembered that Professor Christlieb, of Bonn, at the late meeting of the Evangelieal Allianee at Copenhagen, directed attention to the religious status of the city of Hamburg as exceptionally terrible. Reeent statistics go to show that he was correet in his estimate. There are, in the first and second districts of the eity, 280,000 members of the parishes, but ouly 13 per eent. of the adults are eommunicant members. The church seating capacity for these two districts is only 21,000; and yet the churches are generally half empty. Less than 75 per cent. of the children born were baptized, whieh means something in Germany, where the neglect of infant baptism is considered as the final step into the ranks of outspoken unbelievers.

—A friend in Australia sends us a copy of the People's Tribune, published in Melbourne, which quotes an interesting extract from an address by Bishop Moorhouse, at a meeting in Sale, Gippsland. The Bishop takes the broad Christian interpretation of the term which effectually disposes of the false claims of the lodge.

—No less than thirty-three distinct missionary agencies are at work in Africa at the present time. In South Africa there are 450 Protestant missionaries, 95 native ministers, 40,000 communicants, and 45,000 scholars. On the west coast, 190 missionaries, 33,000 communicants, 250,000 under instruction, and probably 1,000,000, more or less, under the influence of Christianity.

—Mrs. Peek, widow of Philander Peck of Chieago, who has just died, bequeathes over $400,000 to establish a home for incurables in Chicago. She also bequeathed $10,000 eaeh to the Old People's Home, the Ameriean S. S. Union, and Lake Forest University.

—Rev. A. P. Happer, D. D., the well known and devoted missionary of the Presbyterian ehurch to China, is compelled by ill health to relinquish work and return home to Ameriea. He has been in mission work in China for fifty years.

—During the bombardment of Foochow, China, the native Christians did not suspend services for a single Sabbath. Outsiders, who came in while the arsenal was being bombarded, were surprised at the calmness of the worshipers.

—Not long ago the King of Uganda, Afriea, wishing to impress the first explorers with his skill in the use of firearms, took some of his women to serve as targets! Since then two of King Mtesa's daughters have been received into the mission church at Ugunda, and are engaged in giving religious instruction to others in the royal harem. Nothing but the Gospel could have effected sueh a radical change.

—There is an agency known as Evangelization by Book-Post in Franee, which is sending Testaments and traets all over the nation. It is said that 40,000 eopies of one of Spurgeon's best tracts have been sent to Roman Catholic priests. Moody's sermons are distributed in the same way.

—The Golden Rule, of Boston, writing of Massaehusetts, says: "An army of 12,000 teachers in this State can report but an everage of 1,171 additions to the chureh per year, or one conversion to eaeh ten teaehers, or one out of eighty-scholars! Are not such results 'appalling, disloyal and most humiliating?'"

—Le Chretien Belge says that at "the close of last year a young Japanese Christian was imprisoned in Tokio for having too freely expressed his liberal opinions. In the prison he explained the Gospel, espeeially to one man, who beeame a Christian and was most eager for further instruction. Other prisorers gradually gathered round him until the young Hara had a eongregation of three hundred, to whom he preaehed salvation through Jesus Christ. On being liberated Hara brought to the knowledge of the authorities the miserable condition of the prisoners, whieh ended by his being appointed governor of a newprison, with full liberty to teaeh and practiee the prineiples of Christianity."

—The assertion of Col. Robert Ingersoll that Christianity is dying, is answered as follows by Rev. Dr. Kittridge, of Chicago:

In the year 1000 there were fifty millions of Christians in the world, including communicants of the Greek and Roman Catholic churehes; all believed in the fundamental truth of a crueified and risen Saviour. In the year 1500, the fiifty millions had increased to 100 millions. In 1700, to 155 millions. In 1800, to 200 millions, and in that year began the great awakening of the ehurch to the conversion of the whole world. And in these eighty years the 200 millions have grown to 415 millions. This looks like a dying Christianity.

In the year 1800 there were in this country of actual communicants in evangelieal churehes, 364,872. In 1850, half a century later, there were 3,528,988. Twenty years later in 1870, there were 6,673,306, and ten years later, in 1880, there were 10,065,963. Dying rapidly, you see, at the rate of au inerease in strength of about 4,000,000 in ten years. Let me give you another alarming sign of approaching death. The population of the United States increased from 1850 to 1870, 66 per cent., while the members of evangelical churches reached 89 per eent. From 1870 to 1880, the inerease of population was 30 per cent., and of ehurch members 50 per eent. Does not this look like speedy death? And to figures grand like these, the infidel flings baek the unmanly, insulting answer, "They are all insicere and do not believe what they profess. I am sincere, but they are all hypocrites." Well, there is one test of any one's sincerity, that is his pocket-book. Insincerity does not open the purse strings and pour out its wealth for a cause in which it has no faith. Let me give you the sums contributed by Christians of this country for the two objects of home and foreign missions. From 1830 to 1839 the contributions were $5,228,000; from 1840 to 1849, $8,141,000; from 1850 to 1859, $16,507,000; from 1860 to 1869, $34,099,000; and from 1870 to 1879, $56,133,000—and these immense sums given freely to the spread of Christianity by those who, at heart, did not believe in it!—Exchange.

—American missions in Syria were begun in 1821, Jerusalem being the eenter of operations. The work at this point was subjeet to many interruptions, and at last it was abandoned. In 1823 work was begun in Beirut, where, with one or two brief sus pensions, it has been since maintained. The labor is done among Moslems and the nominal Christian sects of the region. The mission was at first carried on by the Amerieau Board; but in 1870 it was transferred to the Board of Missions of the Presbyterian church. Eli Smith, W. M. Thomson, C. V. A. Van Dyck, H. H. Jessup, S. H. Calhoun, and other well-known men have been eonnected with this mission. Their labors have been attended with success. Native churches have been gathered in Beirut, Sidon, Hums, and other places. The members have had to undergo mueh perseeution, but they have shown themselves faithful. The first Moslem convert was baptized in 1871. The membership of the ehurehes is now about 1,200. During the past year 120 were added on profession of faith. The whole Protestant community numbers about 4,000. Much school work has been done. There are now connected with the mission 151 sehools with 6,000 pupils, more than 1,500 of whom are girls. Of these schools 123 are eommon schools with 5,200 scholars. Above these are 20 high schools with 477 pupils. Still beyond these are boarding schools, intended largely for the training of teachers, two of these sehools being for boys, with 75 scholars, and three for girls, with 118 pupils. In the Beirut Female Seminary there are 85 boarders, with a teachers' class of 16. The Syrian Protestant College has ten American professors, five Syrian instructors and 175 students. This institution will take rank with our better American eolleges. There is also a Theologieal Seminary. The eollege has a medieal department, and the medieal missionaries have done a great work. The mission has made great use of the press. More than nineteen million pages were issued last year, and the Arabic Bible, translated by the missionaries, must take a foremost plaee in Arabic literature.—Independent.

FROM MISSISSIPPI.

The Convention of the Assoeiated Churches of Christ met at Ridgeway Academy, Lowndes Co., Miss., Dec. 3, 1884. The meeting was one of great interest and eneouragement. The following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, The legal prohibition of the liquor traffic in the United States is a necessity; and

WHEREAS, Secret orders are the continual, powerful and secret enemies of prohibition; therefore

Resolved, That we do bid all who are working for prohibition godspeed, and urge every true friend of our country and humanity to push forward this work.

Resolved, That we especially urge them to unite in opposing secret orders, and

Resolved, That we call on them to do all in their power to encourage total abstinence.

THE
A NEATLY PRINTED SIXTEEN PAGE WEEKLY JOURNAL, UNSECTARIAN AND OPPOSED TO SECRET SOCIETIES.

THE POLE STAR OF REFORM.

EVERY Christian, every Prohibitionist and every Patriot should read it for the following among other reasons:

1. Because it meets the wants of the general public by giving in brief the latest reliable information on all questions of Reform, having the special object of exposing and opposing organized secrecy. Besides able editorial, contributed and selected articles upon this topic, which is of more than national importance, it has interesting sketches of progress and incidents from the reform lecturers in all parts of the country, reform news and notes, letters from the Old World, etc., etc. It is the especial organ of this movement in America—a movement which is sustained by the utterances of some of the ablest statesmen and divines whom the country has produced. Every person interested in either the family, government, or religion—the most sacred interests of humanity—is directly affected by secret societies, and needs to keep posted in this movement.

2. Because it is uncompromising on ALL questions of the day. On temperance, tobacco, Sabbath desecration, Mormonism, the Southern and Indian questions, civil-service reform, monopolies, the rights of labor, and every other question, its only aim is to be RIGHT, and advocate the TRUTH. It is hence FEARLESS and OUTSPOKEN.

2. Because it emphasizes the fact that political action should be directed by conscience enlightened by the WORD and SPIRIT of God and that Christ must be acknowledged KING of NATIONS, and presents a platform epitomizing the science of civil governments based on the supreme authority of the DIVINE WORD.

4. Because, in addition to these features, it contains a choice selection of wholesome reading for the family, from oldest to youngest, with religious and secular news, market reports, etc.

It is now owned and published by the

HOME HINTS.

FARM LIFE COMMENDED.

It is a common complaint, says Scribner's Magazine, that the farm and farm life are not appreciated by our people. We long for the more elegant pursuits, or the ways and fashions of the town. But the farmer has the most sane and natural occupation, and ought to find life sweeter, if less highly seasoned, than any other. He alone, strictly speaking, has a home. How can a man take root and thrive without land? He writes his history upon his field. How many ties and resources he has; his friendships with his cattle, his team, his dog, his trees, the satisfaction in his growing crops, in his improved fields; his intimacy with nature, with bird and beast, and with the quickening elemental forces. Cling to the farm, make much of it, put yourself into it, bestow your heart and your brain upon it, so that it shall savor of you and radiate your virtue after your day's work is done.

EVENINGS AT HOME.

Recipe for making farmers' boys love to stay at home in the evenings:

1. Treat them as partners with you. Give them to understand that they are interested in the success of the farming operations as much as you are yourself.

2. Converse freely with them. Get their opinions, and give them yours. If at all prudent, make use of their plans, and when you think your own best, explain to them why you do not adopt theirs. Don't keep them altogether in the dark with reference to your plans for the future.

3, Don't require them to stay at home in the evenings all the time. When there is any meeting or entertainment from which they might receive benefit, let them go often.

4. Provide them with plenty of good books and papers especially referring to agriculture. Let them be well posted in their own business—farming.

5. Never scold them because they do not do their work or attend to the business of the farm as well as you do. Encourage them.

6. Give them a holiday now and then; they look for it and they need it; it will be better for you and them to let them have it.

7. A little rational amusement now and then, such as croquet, cricket, a sail, and a swim, will give variety health and contentment.—Ex.

PRESERVING MILK.—If milk is brought just to the boiling point, then poured immediately into cans and sealed air-tight, it will keep indefinitely. As the air is expelled by boiling, the milk keeps just as canned goods do. If glass jars are used they must be heated so that the boiling milk will not break them. Many families keep but one cow and this plan will enable them to have milk during the weeks that she is dry.

Good Periodicals.

NEWS DEALERS and the READING PUBLIC will, we believe, give hearty welcome to the three new periodicals which we now have the pleasure of announcing. The reading public will be pleased because they will have the opportunity of securing high-class literature in attractive form at prices probably never before equalled. News dealers will be delighted with the NEW METHODS of doing BUSINESS which we introduce,—full particulars on application.

The Irving Weekly, AT THREE CENTS PER COPY, (specimen copy free), will be devoted almost exclusively to high-class fiction. It will not enter at all into competion with the high-priced (but low-character) sensational story papers. The first number, ready Christmas week, will contain the opening chapters of serial stories by WILLIAM BLACK, author of "Judith Shakespeare," "A Princess of Thule," etc., and by HUGH CONWAY, author of "Called Back," etc. These two great attractions will be supplemented soon by serial stories by JAMES PAYN, B. L. FARJEON, Mrs. OLIPHANT, and other noted writers. Besides these, there will be shorter stories, and choice miscellany, making the IRVING WEEKLY an unrivalled source of healthful mental recreation, and of entertainment for all.

The Irving Magazine: published MONTHLY, at 15 CENTS per copy, will, in the character of its literature, be in emphatic contrast to THE IRVING WEEKLY. It will be devoted exclusively to "solid" literature, the best that can be found in the high-class reviews and magazines of England and the Continent, or secured from the pens of the most eminent and able of American writers.

The Young American: published weekly, at 2 cents per copy (specimen copy free), will be an illustrated paper for wide-awake girls and boys. It will aim to be as entertaining and attractive as the most popular of its high-priced rivals, and at the same time so instructive, and so healthful in its influence, that parents and teachers, as well as the young people, will give it hearty welcome.

Please ask YOUR NEAREST NEWSDEALER to show you copies of these publications at once, and if they please you, give him your standing order. We prefer that you order through the local dealer, rather than to subscribe direct, but will receive orders from all places where they are not kept by dealers. JAS. B. MILLAR & CO., Publishers, Oak & Pearl Sts., New York.

A Wonderful Life,
AND
A Wonderful Book.

Laura S. Haviland is a quiet, gentle, unassuming Quaker woman, 76 years of age, yet vigorous, who has had a remarkable career of usefulness, and has now given to the world a remarkable history of her "Life Work" as a teacher, at an early day, of the colored refugees in Canada and in Michigan, and in other States, as a traveler down South in the guise of a "berry picker," helping out into freedom many slaves; as a nurse and preacher to the sufferers in hospitals during the war; and with Gov. St. John and Elizabeth Comstock, relieving the destitute and suffering refugees in Kansas, etc.

Her book is neither fiction nor founded on fiction, but is an interesting narration of facts of a most thrilling character, as every one will find and testify who will get and read her book, now on sale at the Cynosure office, 221 W. Madison St, Chicago, Ill. Price, cloth, $1,75; half Russia, $2.25.

THIS is a pleasant surprise in many ways. The author is Rev. W. T. Meloy, of the United Presbyterian Church of Chicago, and the book is published by the Board of Publication of his denomination. It is a love story, not "fascinating," but with so much of genial interest that the reader is in no danger of laying it down unfinished. * * * The moral purpose of the book is to describe and vindicate Christian character, in its more heroic aspects, and it is a success. We congratulate the author and the United Presbyterian Board of Publication on this literary lily of the valley.—The Interior.

"LUCILLE VERNON" is evidently not an ideal sketch, but the fictitious names used represent to a great extent real men and women of flesh and blood. The characters of many of them are by no means attractive, but are perfect counterparts of querulous, obstinate and parsimonious professors who are thorns in the flesh of many a pastor in all the churches. But as in all the churches, there were also good and true men and women at Lansington, who upheld and encouraged the pastor. * * * In its author will be recognized the worthy pastor of the First United Presbyterian Church of Chicago, and a welcome contributor to these columns.—United Presbyterian.

IT belongs to the class known as the religious novel. It is a love story written in the Pansy style, and so constructed as to teach sound moral and religious principles, in connection with quite an interesting narrative. Indeed, when the writer sat down to examine it, he commenced as a critic on the sharp lookout for blunders, but soon he became absorbed in the story, and forgot altogether his critical duties. He also noticed that when the members of his family commenced to read it, they had but little time for anything else until it was completed. Tried as a work of art by the practical test, it must be regarded as a success. Its influence will doubtless be good in correcting false views, and in helping the reader to sounder principles and to a better spirit. * * * Some may think some of the scenes depicted are not true to nature, but the critic would be likely to find, on inquiry, that the very incidents which he would select as unnatural are actual facts. "We often find that truth is stranger than fiction."—D. A. W. in the Christian Instructor.

The heroine, who becomes the bride of the pastor of the church at Lansington, is a wonderful exemplification of how a woman who is a true wife and help-meet may throw her life and energies into the great work of saving souls; aiding, by gentle words and sympathy, wise counsel and brave endurance, the husband having charge of a congregation where the Demon of Misrule held full sway. We follow with interest the history of the wife and husband through their hours of despondency and discouragement to the happy ending, where religion, harmony and peace have gained the ascendency and the good man and wife find their reward.—Pittsburgh Daily Telegraph.

FARM NOTES.

SPREADING MANURE IN WINTER.

Drawing manure and spreading it on the land for spring crops, as fast as it accumulates, has several advantages. Drawing directly from the stable obviates the necessity of handling it again; the ground being frozen hard, the wheels do not cut into the soil, nor the tread of the horses' feet pack the ground as when soft in the spring; the rains and melting snows wash the fertilizing portions into the soil ready for acting on the crops, which is especially beneficial to the corn crop planted on inverted sod; and the work being already performed when spring arrives, it does not interfere with the hurrying business of that season. An objection is often made to the practice, that winter rains will wash away the manure and carry off the richer portions on the frozen or icy surface of the ground, especially on hillsides and sloping land. The objector forgets that the same warm weather and rain which dissolve the manure also thaw enough of the surface of the ground to catch and absorb the slowly leeching fertilizer. We placed heaps of manure on a hillside in winter. All the winter rains washed it. The effect of the manure was visible on the grass four or five feet below but no further. The New England Farmer reports the experiment of J. N. Perrin, stated to the Vermont Board of Agriculture. He manured a side hill in autumn, leaving a strip unmanured near the bottom, expecting the wash would fertilize this strip sufficiently. But he was mistaken; for the crop on it was light and inferior to the rest of the field. There was do diminution on the manured part by washing. The only exception which can occur is in the bottom of swales or other depressions which collect water in the form of floods in time of spring rains and thaws, and thus carry off whatever of loose manure there is from the surface. Yet even here all would not be lost, as the soil will have absorbed already a part of the fertilizer. Winter manuring is particularly beneficial to grass lands which retain more perfectly any dissolved fertility, which is conveyed down to the roots of the grass. Hence the reason that the spreading of manure in autumn or winter on sod, which is to be inverted for planting corn, is specia y beneficial; manure thus applied, according to repeated experiments, proving at least double the value of spring manure for the corn crop. It is hardly necessary to add that when the fodder and litter used for bedding animals are passed through a cutting machine, the short manure is more easily handled and more perfectly spread, and is consequently more efficient in its action on the land. There is no doubt that this increased value pays for the labor and expense of cutting, not taking into account the greater value of the chopped food for feeding the animals.—The Cultivator

COOKING FOOD FOR SWINE.

In cold weather much good is done by feeding hogs heated food. It warms up the body and stimulates the digestive organs to vigorous action. It pays always to warm slops in cold weather. The main reason farmers do not feed more cooked food to their swine, is fancied labor and trouble in preparing it. A good utensil is a large iron kettle, swung upon two poles of sufficiently strong wood. The bail is removed, and a piece of chain, forming a loop a foot long, is passed through each eye of the kettle and over the respective pole. The poles are placed on forked sticks, set in the ground. The poles should be parallel, and as far apart as the eyes of the kettle. Place near the kettle a large, light trough, made of two-inch pine boards, which may be situated in a small lot separated from the hog lot by a fence with a small gate. Old broken fence rails make excellent, cheap fuel. They ignite readily, give a quick, hot fire and soon die down. When the cooking is done rake the fire to one side, and bring the trough partially under the kettle on that side from which the fire has been removed. Raise the pole from that side out of the crotches, and let it down. This will tilt the kettle on the edge of the trough, and most of the food will be deposited in it; the balance is easily scooped out with a board or pan. When only one pole is used, it is difficult to get the cooked food into the trough. After the food has cooled sufficiently, open the gate in the fence and let the hogs in to the feast. Managed in this way, the labor of cooking a kettle of food can be done in five minutes, and the only expense of making the ration is a few pieces of old rails.—Am. Agriculturist.

The Coming Conflict.

A NEW AND STRANGE STORY BASED ON STARTLING FACTS, VIVIDLY PORTRAYING A MYSTERIOUS AND DANGEROUS POWER AT WORK IN THE GOVERNMENT, THE CHURCH, AND THE HOME.

"All will agree that this is a powerfully written story."—Evangelist, (Chicago, Ills.)

"A book which we trust may have a wide circulation."—National Baptist, (Philadelphia.)

"So intensely interesting did I find it that it was hard to pause until the last sentence was read. This work places the author high among the writers of fiction."—W. W. Barr, D. D. in Christian Instructor, (Philadelphia.)

"Unless we are greatly mistaken, the work will do more to awaken the American church and people to the evils of Freemasonry than any other book recently published."—Evangelical Repository.

"The book will create a sensation in Masonic circles, and evoke criticism of a most relentless character. The courage of the author in attacking such a rock-rooted bulwark as Freemasonry is something to admire, Fanatic though he be."—Nebraska Watchman.

"Light is needed on this subject and needed badly, and we welcome this contribution to the literature of anti-secretism, and cordially commend it to the favorable attention of our readers."—United Presbyterian, (Pittsburgh.)

'A charming work, fit to be classed with 'Uncle Tom's Cabin;' it is indeed less a work of fiction. The volume is as valuable as a work of reference as it is agreeable, truthful and useful. Our young folks will not leave the book, if they begin it, till they 'see how it turns out.' "—Cynosure, (Chicago, Ills.)

The Facts Stated.

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt. William Morgan. The frontisplece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribes his NAME to the letter, but ATTACHES HIS AFFIDAVIT to it.

In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscions sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of "secret societies."

The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

HOLDEN WITH CORDS,

OR THE POWER OF THE SECRET EMPIRE. A faithful representation in story of the evil influence of Freemasonry, by E. E. FLAGG, author of "Little People," "A Sunny Life," etc. This is a thrillingly interesting story, accurately true to life because mainly a narration of historical facts. 384 pages. In cloth, $1; per doz., $9. Paper, 50c; per doz., $4.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"There is no important history extant but has connected with it numerous other histories of which it was the initial point, or the dominating influence. The abduction and murder of Morgan set ten thousand secret springs in motion, as the surrender of the charters of so many lodges at that time, and the severing of their connection with the order of some forty thousand of its members indicated. This story is one of these histories, and is a collection of facts woven into a story. It cannot fail to be read with interest."—Free Methodist, Chicago.

"The republication of the Reform Story which run through the columns of the Cynosure for nearly a year is at last completed, and the book so anxiously expected by thousands of our readers has come from the press of Ezra A. Cook. The book is finely bound and fairly introduces the reader to the treasures within. The publisher has made occasional selections from Masonic works to verify the statements of the text; these make a helpful addition for some who can afford no more complete an armory of this kind."—Christian Cynosure.

"It is one of the most fascinating narratives we ever read and teaches its lesson in a manner not soon to be forgotten. It is evidently written for the heart and its words go to the heart. It is singularly free from wild denunciation. Those who are interested in the secret society question would do well to form the acquaintance of this interesting work."—Lutheran Standard, Columbus, O.

"The exciting scenes of the fall of 1826, at Batavia, N. Y., when Wm. Morgan was murdered by Masonry, are woven into the story so as to give the truth of History a setting of attractiveness. The forty chapters of the volume are soon compassed by the eager reader who begins the volume. This volume ought to be read and will be sought as its merits become known."—United Brethren in Christ.

"The story is intensely interesting and the author has succeeded in weaving into it a great deal of information in regard to this mysterious order, which is certainly startling if true, and he gives what seems to be undoubted evidence to prove his assertions. The book is one which should be read by both Masons and Antimasons."—Wayne Co. Herald.

"Our Anti-secret society friends are certainly entitled to great credit for their persistence in their efforts to expose and root out secretism. The object of the writer of this story is to present in its true light the crafty, unscrupulous and exceedingly hurtful influence of Masonry, the parent of all the orders."—Reformed Presbyterian and Covenanter.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

WASHINGTON.

The annual report of the Department of Agriculture, now in press, makes the record of the corn production for 1884, 1,795,000,000 bushels; wheat, nearly 513,000,000 bushels, and oats 583,000,000. These aggregates are the largest ever recorded. This rate of yield is 25 8 bushels corn, 13 bushels wheat, and 26.4 bushels oats per acre. These are figures for permanent record.

The Indian appropriation bill agreed upon by the house committee on appropriations, provides for an appropriation of $5,664,136. The estimates amounted to $7,328,049. The appropriation last year was $5,589,403.

COUNTRY.

Ex-Vice President Schuyler Colfax dropped dead, Tuesday morning, at the Omaha depot at Mankato, Minn. He arrived on the Milwaukee road from the east at 10 o'clock and walked to the Omaha depot, a distance of three-fourths of a mile, with the thermometer 30 degrees below zero. After arriving at the depot he lived only about five minutes. It is supposed that the extreme cold, the subsequent heat and the over-exertion caused a stoppage of the flow of blood to the heart.

The message of the Governor of Texas was ordered by the Legislature to be printed in the English, German, Spanish, and Bohemian languages.

A bill was introduced Thursday in the Minnesota Senate providing that persons or corporations combining or conspiring to effect the value of cercals shall be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000.

Bills have been introduced in both branches of the Nebraska legislature prohibiting the manufacture and sale of liquors.

It is said at Philadelphia that an organized movement has begun to prevent the liberty bell from being sent to New Orleans. A number of gentlemen, it is said, have subscribed a large sum to take legal measures to keep the bell in Philadelphia.

English sailors in a drunken condition boarded a British bark, Tuesday, at Portland, Ore., and a fight arose between the crew and the intruders, marlin-spikes and hand-spikes being used with deadly effect. Three were fatally and several others badly wounded.

Oliver Brothers & Phillips and the Oliver & Roberts Wire Company (limited) of Pittsburg, suspended payment, Thursday, but announced that they believed the assets were ample to cover all indebtedness, which is said to be between $3,000,000 and $5,000,000. The mills, employing 4,000 hands, will be closed down but all employes will be paid, and the feeling is that work will be resumed in a short period.

A cyclone Sunday night devastated a region fifty miles north of Montgomery, Ala. Numerous houses were wrecked and one person was killed.

Mormon officials deny that they visited Sonora, Mex., with colonization schemes in view, but simply to introduce the "Book of Mormon" among the Yaquis Indians. The story of an offensive and defensive treaty they regard as puerile.

O'Donovan Rossa asserts that President Arthur's allusion in his message to Congress to dynamiters was inspired by information furnished him by Capt. Phelan, and that the stabbing of the latter was a conspiracy hatched by England's agents in America.

Five hundred pounds of dynamite exploded, Wednesday, in the Somerset, Pa., chemical works, causing the burning to death of two men. All the houses in the town were shaken, and window glass was shattered in residences half a mile from the scene.

A charivari party visited Amos Dibble's house near Howell, Mich., Tuesday night but were fired at by the occupants, one man being killed and three badly wounded. Dibble, who is 60 years old, mourned for his first spouse but nine weeks when he again married a young woman.

The thermometer registered 51 degrees below zero at Miles City, Mont., Friday.

A terrible accident occurred at Laclede, Mo., Friday morning. A freight train west-bound was standing on the sidetrack, when another freight pulled in on the mail line east bound. The engine of the latter was about to come to a standstill when the boiler exploded. The engineers and firemen of both engines were killed or fatally scalded.

A four-ton distilling vessel in the soda-ash works near Syracuse, N. Y., exploded Tuesday morning, the great iron tank ascending seventy five feet and then crashing through the roof, wrecking machinery and causing a loss of $40,000. Twelve men were wounded.

Brakemen at Fort Wayne, on Tuesday, disconnected locomotives from freight trains, removed the fire from the engines, and spiked the switches, preventing the running of trains. This was done on account of the new system of "double-heading," throwing several persons out of employment.

Advices from the Hocking Valley are that many of the striking miners have secured arms and are drilling. The Troy mine, fired on Sunday last, is burning. This was the largest one in the valley, with a capacity of 120 cars of sixteen tons each per day.

The Crouch murder case cost Jackson county, Michigan, $30,000. The persons implicated claim that their expenses have been $25,000.

A 300-pound hog, owned by Farmer Buchanan at Roscoe, Ill., was accidentally buried under a straw rick last October. The animal was extricated alive the other day, and found to weigh but twenty-five pounds, but is regaining flesh.

FOREIGN.

The Hudson Bay Company's steamer Prince of Wales, fur laden, which sailed for Montreal from Moose Factory the first week in last October, is believed to be lost, having been caught in an ice-floe near Charlton Island. The vessel was one of the finest owned by the company, and her cargo was valued at $500,000.

Alhama in Spain was visited again, on Tuesday, by a severe earthquake shock, just as King Alfonso and suite were leaving the city. The shocks were felt at Algarrobo, where the people were panic-stricken. An encampment of refugees in the outskirts of Nerja was burned and the unfortunate, shelterless people exposed to a heavy snowstorm.

The report that France and Germany have come to an understanding on the Egyptian, Chinese and Congo questions is credited in official circles in Berlin. It is said, however, Prince Bismarck is awaiting the result of the French election before giving his decision.

A terrible explosion occurred Thursday in the great coal mine at Lievin au Pas de Calais, France. At the time, fortunately, there were but forty-eight men in the mine. All these were entombed, and twenty-eight bodies have so far been taken out.

The Supreme Court of Canada decided Monday that the Dominion Parliament went beyond its powers when it enacted a liquor-license law to govern all the provinces in the confederation, save only as applied to vessels on the high seas or to wholesale licenses.

Gen. Wolseley telegraphs from Korti that Major Kitchener has returned there, having left Gakdul the 14th inst. The Major reports all quiet and the troops healthy. The guards had built two forts and made several roads. The natives seem to think the British are Turks and keep away, fearing ill-treatment.

Corea has agreed to pay 500,000 taels to Japan as an indemnity for the recent outrage upon the Japanese at Seoul. It is also agreed that a garrison of 1,500 Japanese troops shall remain at Scoul to protect the rights of Japancse residents.

ESPECIAL ATTENTION is called to a series of articles on the Good Templar organization, now appearing in the Cynosure, from the pen of an esteemed Presbyterian minister, whose experience as a member impels him thus to set up a pillar to warn others who may come the same way. The second of these interesting articles appears in in this number. Several others will follow. Do not miss one of them.

Waiting for the next issue is a fine picture of the old jail at Canandaigua, N. Y., where Morgan was confined, and from whence he was seized and hurried to his fate at Niagara. This cut was procured at some expense to the Cynosure, and is pronounced excellent by citizens of Canandaigua.

The Cynosure will remit no effort to become more and more valuable to its readers throughout the year. Please show a number to your friend or neighbor and send his subscription with your own.

As we feared, the Congressional committee have yielded to the begging of the Freemasons and have agreed to give them the privilege of perfoming their heathenism at the dedication of the Washington monument, with the infamous rebel Pike at their head. That such a thing should be allowed by the American people or their representatives is an outrage upon the memory of Washington and the American name. The president and general secretary of the National Christian Association are preparing a protest which should be heard at Washington with the roar of ten million voices. The people must be heard on this matter. The Catholic church, which no one will say is not as honorable a body and worthy of recognition, and as harmonious with American principles as the Masonic lodge, was snubbed at this monument and the Pope's stone broken up and thrown into the Potomac; but by what right are the Masons now to have the post of honor at the dedication?

Following the Woman's Suffrage convention in Washington last week Dr. W. W. Patton, formerly of this city and editor of the Advance, and now of Howard University, preached a sermon in the First Congregational church of Washington on "Women and Skepticism," in which he criticised the convention, so the dispatches say, and gave the opinion that skepticism and immorality are the result of too much female liberty. This was a bold utterance in the faces of Miss Susan B. Anthony and Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, who were in the audience, although it may have been partly true in their cases. After sermon they went to the front, and while one vociferated that if his mother were alive she ought to take him across her knee and spank him; the other with more bitterness said the sermon was a proof of her frequent charges that the worst enemy woman has is in the pulpit. Neither of the parties got to themselves any honor in the encounter; and if Dr. Patton would probably fail as a leader against the woman suffrage movement, the ladies certainly showed themselves unsafe guides and examples for the mothers and daughters of America.

The election of Hon. Wm. M. Evarts to represent the State of New York in the United States Senate marks a change for the better in the political tone of the people, who so long have borne the domination of the lordly Conkling, Knight Templar and patron of pugilists, and of his mediocre successors. Whether or not it is a triumph of the Blaine party as some of his organs boast, it will give to the Senate the services of one of the ablest legal minds in the country. Mr. Evarts, it will be remembered, spoke nobly some years ago at a Yale banquet against the demoralizing secret societies of the college. The Chicago Tribune claims that his election now turned on the very same question of secrecy. Evarts' friends demanded an open ballot in the Republican nominating caucus; those of Morton, a secret one. "The first fight" came upon this question. The custom was in favor of the latter but the other carried more than two to one, being "warmly advocated," says the dispatch, "by outspoken members whose dealings are aboveboard."

The explosion in London, Saturday afternoon, ought to shake clear across the Atlantic; and late, but earnestly, we hope, Congress is awakening to the possible wrong that has been done in suffering O'Donovan Rossa and his gang to live outside a jail or an asylum. Whether he, like Jack Falstaff, is a "mere creature of bombast," or is the chief of a sworn band of assassins will probably be developed on the recovery of Phelan, whose eleven stabs, got the other day in Rossa's office, promise to heal. He insists that he was decoyed to New York, and that his murder had been deliberately planned, because he had given some dynamite history. It is undoubted that his statements were looked upon by the gang as revelations and violations of his assassin oath. Phelan promises a sensation, and has attorneys engaged on the case. But it is not enough that our government should wait till the Kilkenny cats are through with each other. The whole lodge business should be placed under ban.

The November election frauds in this city have had another electric light flashed upon them by a special grand jury. The developments heretofore made, and the trial now pending are by United States officers and before United States courts. The report, from which the following was taken, was to the criminal court of Cook county, by a jury declared to be a more than usually respectable body of men. They say: "Out of 171 precincts into which the city was divided there were but seven at which there were not violations of the election laws; in many cases, perhaps through ignorance, some from carelessness, and others, doubtless, through criminal intent. It is to be regretted that those who appointed the ignorant and careless to important positions can not be held responsible. The evidence would indicate that fraud was attempted or committed at every step as the election progressed—fraud at registration, fraud at the primaries, faud at the reception and at the canvass of the ballots, and fraud at the final canvass of the returns—or, if not fraud, its equivalent in the neglect of official duty. Between the vote cast for the State House appropriation and the value returned for it, there is a deficit of 90,000; while the appropriation of $100,000 for the police, by the returns given, was carried by the majority of several thousand, the actual vote showed that it was defeated." Along with their report the jury returned indictments against 249 election judges. It really has the appearance of a general house-cleaning day in the foul wards of our city politics. To such a state have they come through such disciples of Masonry as Mayor Harrison and the late prosecuting attorney Mills. The latter was the only Republican defeated at the late election on the county ticket, and Harrison is alarmed at the result of his coalitions with the gamblers and thieves who seem to have had their way for years with impunity.

Wendell Philips said truly, "The religious literature of Asia has been compared with the Christian Scriptures. The comparison is not just. That literature has many merits, and contains scattered sayings and precepts of great excellence; but there are heaps of chaff in that, and in the writings of the early Christian Fathers; none in the gospels and epistles. Of the mediæval writings one-half was useless. Of the boasted words of Confucius, seven-tenths must be winnowed out to find what the average reason of mankind would respect."

GOOD TEMPLARISM, DANCING AND CIDER.

BY REV. J. D. GEHRING.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—The statement was made in a previous letter that the Good Templar lodge in Barton, Wis., was in the habit of planning and executing, several times a year, what were styled "Good Templars' dances," and that I protested against that kind of "lodge work." I did so privately and openly. Instead of accomplishing anything against the evil, however, I succeeded only in stirring up a hornets nest, and got stung for my good intentions.

Up to the time of my protest against their dancing parties I had entertained the belief that the majority of the members were on my side of the question and would stand by me. But I was soon undeceived as to that, as the sequel will show. A small majority only took my part; and a still smaller majority did so boldly and openly.

I arose in open lodge one evening, when the invitation was given to speak "for the good of the order," and requested to be allowed to withdraw from the lodge as a member, giving my reasons for the request, which were substantially as follows:

1. I objected to the practice of lodge dances; for, even if the thing was not evil in itself, the tendency was evil and the influence pernicious. Besides, I considered myself disgraced to be counted among persons who were given to such amusements, especially when indulged in systematically—in the name of the lodge. As a consistent Good Templar I ought to try to induce others, and first of all members of my own family, to become members. This, however, I could not, and would not do, believing as I did that such an example and such associations were pernicious. How could I, I asked, encourage my children to become members of an organization which openly practiced and encouraged, and stoutly defended as being right and proper, what I as a Christian was bound to regard as wrong, and evil in effect? And, if I could not consistently ask others to join the order, would it be consistent for me to remain with the order?

It may be proper to add to the above the statement, that the Grand Lodge of the State of Wisconsin, in a special decision rendered prior to the year 1868, declares that: "It is a violation of our obligation to patronize a ball in a hotel or other place where liquor is sold."

This, then, puts the order on the moral side of the question so far as the drink associations are concerned; but, at the same time, it condemns the lodge which violated this decision, as the decision itself is acknowledged to have the force and might of the pledge of the order. What is the penalty for a violation of the pledge? Nothing less than expulsion. In some cases they substitute what they call "re-obligation" as the "penalty" for violation; hence, the dancing members of Barton lodge were proper subjects of this disciplinary (?) measure. But the culprits themselves being in the majority they could dictate their own terms.

True, they did not "patronize a ball in a hotel" where liquor was sold, but they patronized the establishment and aided the business by going there for the "supper" when they had a dance in the lodge room. The Grand Lodge might call that a distinction, but it would not be easy to show the difference.

Moreover, there was another evil connected with these lodge dances, which is not covered by any decision of the Grand Lodge. A German saloon-keeper, whose establishment was within a square and a half of the lodge room, told me, with a merry twinkle in his eye, that those lodge dances were nice things for him, for he always took in from seven dollars upward for whisky and cigars when the lodge had a dance. I did not ask him whether members of the lodge were among his patrons on those occasions, or not—I took it for granted that the whisky was drank and the cigars smoked by "outsiders." But, even taking that for granted, the lodge was responsible for the evil, nevertheless, for by their doing they gave the occasion.

This will serve to show how far the "temperance work" done by such a lodge would reach in influencing the youth of the community for sobriety and honesty.

2. I protested against the requirement of the ritual which compelled me to repeat my obligation at every meeting when I was present. The W. C. asks the question: "Has any member present violated the pledge?" Each member present is required to answer by laying his right hand upon the breast and saying: "I have not." This formula is, in my estimation, equivalent to the obligation itself. The gesture and the accompanying affirmation have the force of a solemn oath. I told them then and there that I could not submit to the rule for conscientious reasons, which I could not ignore or silence by the argument that it was "only a form." In the first place, I said, I took the pledge in good faith when I was initiated and I cannot see that the lodge has a right to demand that I should repeat it every week. Besides, the requirement implied that I could not be trusted.

But the most disgusting part of this solemn farce was the too evident fact that, in many cases, this avowal was false. That it was false in the case already referred to, when the dancers violated a decision of the Grand Lodge, was plain to my mind; and that there were even more plain and aggravated instances of violation I also knew. Could I then, look on in silence and witness such wholesale lying?

But this was not all. There were cases of violation caused by the ignorance of the violator as to the full and correct interpretation of the "obligation," or "pledge," as given in Article II. of the constitution, section 1, which reads as follows:

"No member shall make, buy, sell, use, furnish, or cause to be furnished to others, as a beverage, any spirituous or malt liquors, wine, or cider; and every member shall discountenance the manufacture, sale and use thereof in all proper ways."

Now, the fact that up to the year 1868 there are on record not less than twenty-two "Decisions," rendered by the Grand Lodge of Wisconsin, covering the above pledge, shows conclusively that the text itself is but a small part of a Good Templar's obligation, and that it would be next to impossible for the most intelligent and conscientious of the members to steer clear of violations. Hence it is also easy to discern the fact that, from a moral standpoint, it would be hazardous for any one to get up before the assembled lodge and solemnly swear: "I have not violated my pledge."

Thus I argued when I gave my reasons for desiring to withdraw from the order. And I supported my argument, further, by telling them that I myself had been ignorant of the Grand Lodge decisions until I obtained a copy of the constitution and by-laws, and that, according to one of those decisions, I had ignorantly and innocently violated my pledge. But that, as I could not submit to the prescribed penalty (re-obligation) unless those who were responsible for my ignorance, and hence, for my transgression, should be subjected to the same punishment, I thought 'twould be best if they would allow me to withdraw.

I had, only a few days previously, found among the decisions of the Grand Lodge one which said: "It is a violation of our obligation to drink, use, or sell sweet cider." Now, it had transpired a short time before, that I engaged one of the members of the lodge to take some apples we had, along with some of his own, to the cider mill and make some cider for us, for the purpose of making some apple butter. I happened to be away from home when the cider came, and when I returned I drank of it enough to decide whether it was fit to be made into apple butter or not. I never liked sweet cider well enough to use it as a "beverage." The children liked it and drank of it, but we kept none on hand for even them—not considering it wise to encourage them in the free use of sweet apple-juice.

I made this statement on the floor of the lodge and explained the circumstances; pointing out the fact that if I was guilty of violation the brother who had made the cider was even more so. He acknowledged that he drank all he wanted at the press, and could not see the wrong in it.

Well, what did the lodge do? Taking their motto, so boastingly displayed on all occasions, as a guide, what should they have done in the case? "Faith, Hope and Charity" is the crown of their ritual. "Charity" is their chief boast; and charity demanded that punishment should not be inflicted where there was no equivalent guilt—yes, common justice forbade the exercise of their severest discipline. But charity and justice were not consulted. They expelled me without even the semblance of a trial. They even neglected to give me the usual notice of their action. The man who made our cider voted to expel. The members who patronized the whisky hotel for their dance-supper, voted to put me out. One of the most active and prominent members of the lodge, who claimed that he would, and could, sell his barley to the brewery in West Bend, if that was "the usual market," and his apples to Mr. Smith to be made into cider for his saloon trade, if that happened to be the best market he could find, and do it without violating his pledge—this man, too, voted to put me out. He even made a loud and strong speech against me, I was afterward informed.

This was the answer of the lodge to my protest against an evil practice.

WEEKDAY SERMON.

BY E. E. FLAGG.

"I have been thinking what wrong ideas Christians sometimes get into their heads," said Mrs. F. to me the other day. "One of my greatest trials has always been the lack of power to express my spiritual feelings adequately, or explain my reasons for holding views that might be contrary to those generally held by others. And I remember one time when this infirmity of mine became a real temptation.

"I took my ground against a certain thing as wrong which most people saw no harm in, and of course I was misunderstood. Perhaps I ought not to have minded it when members of my own church called me 'opinionated,' and 'narrow,' and 'righteous overmuch,' but a Christian may be proof against all the fiery darts of the adversary and not be sting proof. The little barbed point of sarcasm fine as a cambric needle will go where a sword thrust couldn't do any hurt. With me the real poison of these stinging tongues lay in the feeling that there would be an end to all the misunderstanding if I could only put the matter before their minds in the same clear light in which it appeared to me. And then the doubt crept in whether I had any religion at all, or wouldn't the Lord have given me a better gift of utterance? That temptation followed me, and when I tried to say a few words in the class meeting I made such a miserable failure, saying what I didn't mean, and leaving unsaid what my heart was bursting to say, that I went home feeling like the barren fig-tree, and wondering why I was permitted to cumber the ground.

"What temptation—to imagine that the gift of talking readily and glibly about spiritual things to saint or sinner, is a part of true conversion kept me in darkness for days, till I grew so burdened in mind that I could hardly go about my daily task.

"Our minister was a faithful man of God, and I thought, surely if light or comfort could come from human source, I should get it from him, but at first he seemed to misunderstand me as badly as Eli did Hannah. Perhaps that was my fault for you see I couldn't tell him exactly what the trouble was without mentioning names, and that I didn't want to do. He talked to me a long time, but I felt more in the dark when he finished than when he began.

"'Sister F.,' he said at last, 'before your mind can be at peace you must stop cavilling.'

"Now, I hadn't the slightest idea of cavilling, and I told him so. I don't suppose poor Hannah felt more grieved when Eli accused her of drunkenness; but when I come to think it over afterwards I could see how natural it was for him to take up the idea that I was finding fault with the Lord's dealings in not bestowing upon me greater gifts. He saw that I was hurt, and he took my hand, and said he, 'If I spoke unadvisedly you will forgive me, Sister F., and remember that gifts are not grace.

"The light burst right in upon me. That was exactly what I had been doing, putting gifts in the place of grace, but I never fell into that mistake again; and many a time it has been given to me to comfort some doubting, discouraged soul by repeating those four little words, 'Gifts are not grace.'"

And are they not worth pondering? We are so apt to look upon extraordinary gifts as the high water mark of spiritual life that we need to study more closely the thirteenth chapter of Corinthians. We cannot all preach with the tongues of men and of angles, but we can all have charity.

Grace is the gift of gifts. Beside it the mere ability to preach, or pray, or exhort, is as the pebble beside the diamond. We who can only stammer in the language of Canaan may take the comfort to heart—that it is grace alone which makes us heirs of the kingdom, and the gifts of an archangel without it would not ensure us so much as a glimpse over the threshold.

MORE QUESTIONS FOR THE MASONIC MAGI.

1. By what code of ethics does the fraternity square its treatment of Morgan, Rathbun, Starry, and hundreds more whom they have handled? As Masonry is, according to its books, "the most moral institution that subsists," please instruct a poor novice in the royal art, how to use the square in such bloody work.

2. By a report for 1883, I see the degree of Skull-tipping claims about 60,000 members in this country. Surely the American churches must be doubly safe with such legions of sworn defenders. Pledged as they are under the covenant and penal law of "double damnation," it is at their sovereign behest to say, "Fear not, little flock."

When did the King of the saints resign the care of his flock over to the "Knights of the Sword?" Mentors of science and religion, instruct us.

Where do the Royal Knights of the skull find so many craniums?

3. How did it happen that twenty 32-degree Masons and two of 18 degrees, belonging to the Scottish Rite system, in Columbus, Ohio, opened their eyes to the fact that they had been grinding in the mills of an absolute despotism, and so bolted the course, in a royal batch? Has the age of miracles returned, when men whose souls are steeped in a thousand oaths, may see the cords that bind every power of body and mind in a thousand coils?

4. How could moral intelligence go up (?) 32 degrees in this sublime demonstrosity and not find that speculative Masonry is despotic from its inception to its thirty-third, or bottom round? These sublime sons of the craft, seem still ignorant of the Scripture maxim of the tree and its fruit.

5. Is there no way of turning down the terrible light which threatens the utter destruction of our Masonic tree? The blight has struck it, and the number of the royal craftsmen is growing less. We would, but cannot, close our eyes to the appalling fact. We are praying for less light. How can we shut it off? That N. C. A. is killing us.

CATECHUMEN.

"FREEMASONRY IS A RELIGION."—Such is the claim made by some of its members and authors, and repeated by Anti-masons. And some outsiders reply, "I don't know, I never was a Mason, and therefore don't know whether it is a religion or not."

But a Christian asks whether, as a religion, it acknowledges the Christ of the New Testament as its head and the "only name given under heaven whereby men must be saved," and the reply confounds him. For Freemasonry teaches that a man of any religion can be a Mason if he shall agree to abide by the laws of Masonry. Jews and Mohammedans and Christians may be one in Masonry and in its worship; hence Christ must be to Masons no more than Mohammed, and neither can be of authority in the lodge worship, for that would offend the Jew. "Oh, says outsider, "I don't know, for I was never in a lodge."

"Were you ever a Roman Catholic, sir?" asked a by-stander.

"No," said outsider.

"Then," said by-stander, "by your rule you don't know whether the Catholics use a wafer instead of the bread and wine. Rather strange logic, sir, but I prefer to accept testimony and to avoid poison when so labelled rather than to taste it and be poisoned to find the proof."

WHO WILL BE A KNIGHT TO-DAY.

BY ALEXANDER THOMSON.

Now who will be a knight to-day,
As when long years ago
The warriors rode in gleaming steel
And daneing plumes of snow.
When fought the hero of Navarre
For Franee's freeborn thought,
And close around his banner pressed,
Each dauntless Huguenot;
Or, as when in our Mother-land
The hymn of battle rose,
When Cromwell's iron saints rode down
The squadrons of their foes.

Now who will be a knight to-day,
And beard the hosts of sin,
That like the spriug tide, deep and strong
Is darkly rolling in.
O'er every rampart sweep their tides,
A cruel hungry sea,
With sharks that feed on human souls
And sons of Liberty:
Now who shall take the sword of God
And strike the robbers down;
Or die for love and law on earth,
And Christ's eternal crown?

O ye who stand on Zion's walls
And see the deadly foe,
And never lift a warning voice,
Nor yet the trumpet blow:
Who, satisfied with present good,
And in your place seeure,
Care uot how many rav'ning wolves
Devour God's humble poor;
O faithfess shepherds, hireling crew,
Who lead your weary flock
To mountains wild and deserts dry,
Far from their shelt'ring Rock,
Be sure that when the Master comes
His bleeding ones to see,
Eaeh life upon the desert lost
Shall be required of thee.

O ye, who like Elijah stand
Upon the mount alone,
While leaping rouud its rugged base,
Baal's prophets howl and moan;
Who, faithful to his word would turn,
The people from their sin,
And backward roll the mighty tide
So strongly setting in,—
O sit not thon in nether gloom,
Nor bow the heart in fear,
Thou art the herald, thou His choiee
To bring salvation near;
And round the vast as ocean sands
God's witnesses attend,
And principalities and powers
Before thy prowess bend.
And ye may to our own loved land
From dark wrongs bring release;
And whom men count a brand of war
Prove harbinger af peace.

NEW YEAR'S MISSIONARY APPEAL.

"Why abodest thou among the sheepfolds?"
"If ye love me, keep my commandments"

Eighteen hundred years have passed away since our blessed Lord Jesus was upon earth. Nearly his last words were, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." He had given his life for the world; he had made a "propitiation for the sins of the whole world;" he had "appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself;" he had "preached peace," having "made peace by the blood of his cross." Poor guilty ones had believed the message, and had been pardoned, "justified," "accepted in the Beloved," made "kings and priests to God."

These saved ones had the glorious mission of announcing the love of God to man. They were called to the high office of "ambassadors for Christ," and "fellow-workers with God." For a time they realized their mission, and "multitudes were added to the church." Persecution arose, by which "they were all scattered abroad, except the apostles."

But they that were "scattered abroad, went everywhere preaching the Lord Jesus; and the hand of the Lord was with them, and a great number believed, and turned to the Lord."

Gradually the church fell asleep, and the Lord's command and the desire of his heart was forgotten. The Gospel was not preached; centuries of darkness passed, and the church slumbered almost in death.

But now God, in his grace, has begun to awaken us, and says, "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from among the dead, and Christ shall give thee light."

Some think that they can almost hear the distant sound of the Master's chariot-wheels approaching, and they remember that "we must all give an account of the things done in the body;" and as they think of his question to each one, "How much owest thou unto thy Lord?" they are obliged to bow their heads in shame. The blessed Lord who asks them bears the marks still of his wounds; they remember he had not where to lay his head, and they see his eye notices their worldly prosperity and their comfort, if not their luxury. They begin to remember how large a portion of their life has been spent, either in accumulating treasures on earth, contrary to his express commaud, or in providing for the "lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life," and for the world. which they now see to be just about to pass away forever. "The time is short," he repeats again, "and the fashion of this world passeth away."

Beloved saints of God, ought we not to "arise from among the dead?" Shall we not realize our high calling and our responsibility? He has intrusted to us this service, and to no one else; and we must obey in his strength. In England we have eñormous responsibilities; "much has been given," and "much will be required." In his providence the whole world is now open. India has long been open. Africa, Japan, are open. All China, with its perishing four hundred millions, is open; and those who have penetrated hundreds of miles into the interior find hearts prepared by God for the Gospel, and already some have believed on Jesus. A missionary, seven or eight hundred miles from the coast, says: "The harvest is plenteous; we are reaping, not merely sowing. God is with us." A Chinese, living in a province containing twenty-five millions, and where the Gospel has been proclaimed, for the first time, this year, said: "Come to us. I know there are many in this city who, like us, are seeking the true way." Have we been faithful to our trust? What response has been given to the cry for help of those who are being "drawn to death"? It is true that some hundreds of devoted laborers have gone forth, sustained by the prayers and pecuniary help of many at home; but the marked blessing that has rested on missionary efforts is only a louder call from God to "go forward." "Go into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature."

There are probably forty thousand congregations in England; it would have been a very small proof of love for the Lord if only one from each of these had gone forth to fulfill the Lord's command. But it is thought that nearly two thousand are in the field from this country; so that from 38,000 congregations, not one is proclaiming the glad tidings of salvation! It is of these the question must be asked, How are you obeying the Lord's command, "Go ye"?

Will you "people of God," who "have been called out of darkness into his marvelous light," to "shew forth his praises," gather together and consider this matter before the Lord, and in the light of his return? Are there none who are willing to go for his sake? God does not necessarily want men of intellect. "Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord."

Listen to the cry, "Come over and help us!" not only addressed to men, but to women. Help is needed to conduct schools, to visit from house to house, and to instruct inquirers in the Word of Life. Will each inquire what are the reasons why he or she should not go? Is it business? Matthew, Peter, James, John, Andrew, were all in business when the Lord called them to follow him, and they "left all and followed him." Have you "bought a farm," and "must you needs go and see it"? or "five yoke of oxen"? and is this the only reason why you say, "I pray thee have me excused"? Perhaps some are simply engrossed with the things of this world. If so, remember "the world passeth away, and the lust thereof." Your brethren and sisters in the battle-field are hard pressed, and often nearly worn out. Will you look on and see them die at their posts, and not go "to the help of the Lord against the mighty"?

But possibly you are, by God's grace, engaged in definite work for him at home. Still, you have to consider whether the very fact of your having been trained by God, and used of God, is not a call to you to go abroad. God can supply your place at home, and make your absence a blessing, as calling out some who are slumbering, to "work while it is day."

If you say the work is too hard, he says, "Follow me." Dear child of God, as the angels look on you at your daily employments, do they praise God that you have indeed presented your body as a "living sacrifice"? or have they to say, "even weeping," that you are almost like those "whose god is their belly, who mind earthly things"?

"The night is far spent, the day is at hand." At least six hundred millions have never heard the name of Jesus; and, probably, at least four hundred millions of the remainder have never heard the Gospel in such a way as to know that it is glad tidings of great joy—that there is a Saviour for them. Multitudes of these perishing ones are groping in the dark after that peace with God which you have found, and know to be for them also.

If you saw them on their death-beds, passing into an eternity of darkness without Christ, how could you answer the reproaches they would heap on you, if they found that you knew the way of salvation, but that your love of ease or worldly advancement had deterred you from making a single effort to tell them the light and joy you had found in Christ Jesus?" Remember, you may in all reality be a fellow-worker with God. Arise; "let no man take thy crown!"

"As a good soldier of Christ, endure hardness." "If we suffer with him, we shall reign with him." "He died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves; but unto him that died for them and rose again." "If he laid down his life for us, we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren." "Behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give to every man according as his work shall be."

Will you who have read this, seek to gather together the church or company of Christians with whom you worship the Lord God Almighty, your Father, to consider how you may obey his command to you, and pray that, at least one from among you may be so constrained by the love of Christ, as to go forth with the message of salvation? Let those who remain count in their privilege to sustain the laborers by prayer, and by ministering of their substance; so that, "tarrying at home," they may "divide the spoils."

"Behold, I come quickly."

We commend this subject to your prayerful consideration.

ANDREW BONAR, GEORGE MULLER,
C. D. MARSTON, RADSTOCK.

BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS:

OR

THE QUESTION OF THE HOUR.

BY E. E. FLAGG, AUTHOR OF "HOLDEN WITH CORDS."

CHAPTER VIII.—Continued.

"But what has all this to do with temperance men voting for Gen. Putney?" asked Nelson, rather impatiently.

"I hain't come to it yet," answered Martin Treworthy, serenely, still keeping his hold on the poker. "It's a long story; it's got as many coils and ramifications as the old Serpent himself. Now take the Grand Army of the Republic. I believe the rank and file of the members are honest men, but they are humbugged. They are made to believe that all the reason for loyal soldiers banding together in secret like a company of robbers is to cultivate fraternal feelings and assist one another, when the real object is to get offices for the leaders. Take all the secret orders in the land—and their name is legion—they are nothing but different manifestations of one lying spirit—Freemasonry. Good Templars, or KuKlux, or Nihilists—it is all the same. Men that will be humbugged by a secret order will be very easily humbugged at the polls. Men that will bind themselves by an oath, or an obligation—I don't care which—to obey leaders they never saw or heard of, will be just as easily made slaves to a party, especially if that party is itself nose-led by the lodge. There's the whole thing in a nutshell. Gen. Putney has been elected by the votes of old soldiers, prohibitionists and liquor men; and I can tell you how it has been done. In the first place he was nominated over the heads of other and better candidates by Masonic leaders of the G. A. R. who all had axes to grind of one sort and another. The G. A. R. is a grand machine for getting fraudulent pensions, and there's lots of bounty jumpers who ought to bless the General for his work in that line when he was Representative. But does anybody who knows Joe Putney and has got as much common sense as you can put on the point of a cambric needle, think for a minute that he cares for the soldiers any more than just to catch their votes. Then the next thing was to dupe the Prohibitionists with lies and fair speeches; and how was that done? Why, by means of Masonic influence controlling the secret temperance orders just as it controls the G. A. R.; magnifying the Republican party, belittling the prohibition movement, ridiculing the prohibition leaders, and lauding Gen. Putney for a temperance man, when it is a fact that brewers and distillers all over the State have poured out money like water to secure his election. Maybe you don't know it, but every saloonist in Jacksonville is a Republican, because the party managers have given him to understand that that's the side his bread is buttered. 'Support our ticket and we won't interfere with your business.' That's the word; and when every bar-keeper is a Mason, or an Odd-fellow, or a Knight of Pythias, or all three, they know pretty well they don't run much risks promising. So the lowest groggery becomes a trap to catch the votes of the drinking class, and we are treated to a spectacle that is enough to make the devil laugh in his sleeve, bar-keepers and temperance men, church members and drunkards, ministers and rowdies, all voting together for the same man!"

"I must say you are making out the political situation to be in even a worse muddle than I thought," observed Nelson, with a shrug of his shoulders. "But if I have been told once I have fifty times that the G. A. R. was not in the least a political organization."

"Tell that to the marines. No; to somebody a great deal greener than the marines, a jack Mason; but don't you go to riling me up by talking as though you believed any of that stuff, Nelson Newhall, or I vow, I don't know but I shall be tempted to show you the door."

Nelson laughed quietly, as a threatening flourish of the poker, which had been buried long enough in the coals to show a red-hot tip, gave emphasis to the words.

"Their hand has been plain enough in this election, I'll confess. It's an idea I don't like. I am not down on secret orders hammer and tongs like you, but I hold to their keeping their fingers out of the political pie and not making a worse hocus pocus of it than it is."

"Might as well say that a cat ought to go against its nature, and not catch birds and mice," retorted Martin. "It is the nature of the lodge to want power, and the way to power is through politics. The saloon party has played us a trick"—

"Which they won't do another time," growled Nelson, who felt that his indignation was most righteous; for through a purposely ambiguous wording of the ballots it was found that many Prohibitionists had voted Yes, on the question of license, believing all the while that they were voting No—a fraud which doomed Jacksonville to another year of rum-rule, the just demand for a recount having been refused.

"Not the same trick, but maybe another just as bad. When the lodge and the saloon strike hands what can honest men expect? Years ago the Lord opened my eyes to see that lodgery, and slavery, and rum, and every other evil that is opposing the reign of Christ, were so many links in the devil's chain; and, Nelson Newhall, the day is coming when your eyes will be opened, too."

Martin Treworthy spoke with a strange solemnity which impressed Nelson too much to ask him what he meant; and in the silence which followed he began to think—feeling almost angry with himself meanwhile that the recollection should occur to him at just that moment—for what could it possibly have to do with Martin Treworthy's prediction?—how the day before he had been visited at his lodgings by a stranger who represented himself as an agent of the Union, empowered to look into matters connected with the works where Nelson was employed. In his immaculate broadcloth and spotless beaver, with his massive gold watch and chain, and his fat, white hands bedecked with rings, this champion of the laborer's rights seemed so evidently to belong to that class of humanity which like the lilies of the field "toil not, neither do they spin," that Nelson did not feel inspired with any particular confidence; but he answered his inquiries frankly. There had been a recent cut-down in the wages which he considered unjust and unreasonable, and this had caused some dissatisfaction among the workmen. But when asked "if there was any talk of a strike," he had bluntly answered "that with the winter just on them and promising to be a hard one, he shouldn't suppose anybody but a fool would talk of such a thing. The capitalist could barricade himself behind his dollars, and then when the strike was over start up again with perhaps an improved market, while ten to one the men would go back to work at the old prices." This vigorous speech was met by the agent with the smooth reply that it was the settled policy of the Union to avoid strikes if practicable, and indeed it was in accordance with this policy that he had been sent out to make these inquiries. But the assurance for some reason did not allay Nelson's feeling of distrust; and still further was it increased when he picked up and began to read a paper left behind him, either accidentally or purposely by this white-handed and be-ringed representative of labor. It was a Socialistic sheet filled with accounts of many real wrongs and abuses and some fancied ones; but with the same false, dangerous, unrepublican remedies for all. He read it awhile, then threw it into the fire with an impatient "pshaw!"—for Nelson Newhall, as a typical American workman, desired most devoutly the elevation of his own class, but with ideas rather than dynamite.

There was reason why Martin Treworthy's words, though not remarkable in themselves, should impress him like a solemn prophecy of things already close at hand. Side by side with his rough, practical common sense ran a vein of that spiritual fire that burns in the souls of prophets and seers; his rough border experience, filled with episodes of unwritten heroism, had fanned the divine flame. Altogether Martin Treworthy was a unique character who never could have been developed on other than Western soil, with a dash of the Yankee, the Puritan and the backwoodsman, all combined. His newspaper had educated him as it has many an American citizen with few early advantages, so that he could talk in a pungent, practical style with no very serious grammatical lapses; while his daily study of the Bible had given him a kind of Hebraistic turn of thought and feeling. Nelson had heard of his strange foretelling of our great civil struggle, and for an instant he felt vaguely thrilled and startled—that involuntary shiver that passes over the spirit when touched by the breath of the supernatural.

"Well," he said, rising with a sigh from his seat before the fire; "this seems home-like, but I must go. Tom don't seem to be quite so well to-day. I wish I could get hold of something that would cure his cough."

"Oh, you must keep up heart. Cut and try, cut and try; that's the way. Now there's Balm of Gilead buds, with a little ipecac and balsam of fir; I've known that to cure a man given over in consumption. I've got some of the buds; always calculate to keep them on hand for sprains and bruises." And Martin Treworthy began to rummage among his rather heretogenous stores on the shelf where he kept his "tin box" with a brisk cheerfulness which might have wakened a heart of hope in the very bosom of despair.

But we must not forget Stephen Howland, who still continued to live with a Spartan economy, satisfied with the thought that he was laying the basis for a legal reputation which would not dishonor the Howland ancestry. Stephen felt not a little honest pride in the good old Puritan stock from which he sprang, and in fighting the liquor oligarchy was he not doing just what they did two or three hundred years ago, only in a different shape and fashion?

He was also fast becoming a good Odd-fellow, according to Mr. Bassett's idea of the term—that is to say, he attended the lodge regularly and was slowly beginning to see some of its peculiar advantages. He had passed all the degrees of Friendship, Brotherly Love and Truth. He had acted over the story of David and Jonathan and the parable of the Good Samaritan with a promiscuous company of church members, ministers, deists, and we must add, profane swearers and libertines. And in all this stealing from Holy Scripture never a mention of that Name above every name which is the central pivot on which all divine truth turns! He had been shown various instructive symbols, such as the All-Seeing Eye, a skull and crossed bones, a coffin, a Bible, and a serpent lifted on a pole, but never a hint of God's wonderful plan of redemption; for even the latter symbol was explained to him as bearing merely the pagan signification of Wisdom, and not as typifying that atoning sacrifice for human guilt once uplifted on Calvary.

To be sure, Stephen was familiar enough with Bible truth. Like young Timothy he had known the holy Scriptures from a child; but the lessons that he learned at the lodge were softly, slowly letting down a veil over his spiritual sight through which the doctrines taught him at his mother's knee, of repentance, of a new birth and faith in a risen Redeemer, appeared as dim and indistinct as the images and sounds about him to one half-locked in slumber. He never thought of Odd-fellowship as a form of salvation or even a form of religion, and had he been questioned would have emphatically denied it was either. He would have scouted the idea that these nightly meetings with their Christless prayers, their equally Christless morality, and ceremonies borrowed from pagan sources, had stolen from him his early faith. And why? Simply because the lodge knows that to keep its victims unconscious of the robbery it must substitute in the place of those truths sham semblances to counterfeit them, as a wax figure counterfeits the living, breathing human form. He read in the Odd-fellow's manual, kindly lent him by Mr. Bassett, that "his initiation into the order was the same thing as regeneration by the Word;" that "it was a leading characteristic of all the ancient rites from which Odd-fellowship was copied that they began in sorrow and gloom and ended in light and joy," just as in the Christian religion the soul passes to the joys of salvation through the narrow gate of conviction and repentance. He read, furthermore, that "the order was a miniature representation among a chosen few of that fraternity which God has instituted among men"—in other words, of the Christian church, the holy nation, the royal priesthood, the peculiar people; that Love (not the love of Christ which constrains us to act justly and mercifully by all men, but that kind which excludes from its bowels of compassion more than four-fifths of the human race) "was the hidden name in the white stone;" and, to crown all, that he had only to be a good Odd-fellow, practicing all its three cardinal virtues "to have the bow of hope span his last resting place," and "find the mysteries of heaven unveiled to his admiring vision."

THE WISCONSIN STATE MEETING.

THE SECRETARY'S REPORT—BRO. RONAYNE'S LECTURES—THE GRANGE COMING OVER TO CHRIST.

MILTON JUNCTION, WIS., Jan. 16, 1885.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Our State meeting closed here last night, with the evident blessing of God, and the benedictions of many of the good people of this community. We hardly expected a large delegation from abroad, and were not greatly disappointed in this respect, but there were some substantial friends of the cause upon the ground. Bro. Bancroft had worked up the matter most faithfully, and the very first evening there was a very encouraging audience.

We expected Bro. Stoddard, but were happily astonished to find Bro. Ronayne also. The Lord was with him, and the people listened with intense interest while he dwelt upon the un-Christian character of Freemasonry. His Wednesday evening address was upon the Christless and empty character of Odd-fellowship, to a very much larger audience; and that on Thursday evening upon the nature of Masonic obligations, and the complete propriety and righteousness of breaking them. There were about 400 people present, and the attention and impression profound. The underpinnings of the secret churches were mightily shaken, and it is to be hoped that many will come out to enter their dark precincts no more. There are many good Christian people here who are strongly opposed to Masonry and Odd-fellowship, many of whom belong to the grange, which consists here of about 120 members. Bro. R. came down on them so gently, and yet so effectually, that the house "came down" with convulsive laughter. Bro. Ronayne held up the glorified Christ in such a way that it would seem that any Christian would most cheerfully give up any and every secret society. Bro. Bancroft thinks there will not be much left of the grange.

Many desire Bro. Ronayne to stay right along and preach Christ to the people. It is to be hoped that he will do so. [illegible] there is reason to hope that the work already done in connection with his lectures will glorify Christ among this people. His Thursday afternoon lecture was on the Ancient Tabernacle and its Symbolism, contrasting the glorious things of God, Christ, and salvation with the mockeries of the lodge, and also between the righteous and the wicked in the resurrection. His descriptions and his appeals were very powerful and impressive. This leads me to say that the movement upon secret societies from the Christian standpoint, showing their antagonism to Christ and the spiritual interests of men, is the true plan, and offers greater hope of success than any other.

Our Association is out of debt and a few dollars on hand. But the friends of the cause are earnestly desired to get out their pocketbooks, and all send contributions for the further prosecution of the good work. Bro. Bancroft has pledged $10 per month for the year to come for the employment of a good organizer to supplement the work he has been doing. Others will be asked to help by way of cash or pledges to be met during the year, and if possible, the man be set to work in the spring, or as soon as funds can be raised to warrant it. It is now settled that Bro. Ronayne will stay and hold Gospel meeting. Signs are very favorable for a great work. Let us pray for this.

Bro. Bancroft has spent 327 days in the work for the year; delivered 91 lectures and sermons on secret societies; travelled 2,844 miles aud more, and by sale or gift placed portions of the literature of the reform in 3,124 families, and finds a growing interest in the subject all over the State. One of the foremost grangers here is thoroughly converted from that order, and intends to go just once more only; and then we think more than one-third part will come with him into the "open field." He cheerfully gives up all he has paid in ten years, to be the "Lord's free man." He will doubtless be the "first brick" in a long row. The grange has 120 members; many of them are now listening to the Good Shepherd, and we believe they will obey. Pray for them.

W. W. AMES, Secretary.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

AUGUSTA, Ill., Jan, 22, 1885.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—The severe storm of Jan. 16th so blocked the railroads that the train which should have brought me to Augusta in Hancock county, by nine P. M. did not reach there till two the next morning. Finding no one at the depot, and the roads being filled up with snow, I wandered nearly an hour before I could find a hotel; and then did not find warmth and comfort. I found my way, however, to the pleasant home of Rev. John Stahl, who with his good wife gave me a cordial welcome. In the afternoon a pleasant ride took me about five miles to the spacious and pleasant home of Bro. D. D. Worman, where I have been most kindly and tenderly cared for.

On Sabbath morning, the 18th, I preached in the United Brethren house, known as Washington Church. Owing to the severe cold the congregation was not large, but seemed to be made up of excellent people. They are at present without a pastor, having declined the services of a preacher who was disloyal to the church; but they have an excellent Sunday school, and will keep up stated meetings.

At the close of the morning meeting I gave notice that in the evening I would preach from Eph. 5: 11, on the relation of secret societies to the Gospel of Christ. Quite unexpectedly a decided opposition was manifested. Some official members held that such a discourse would be a great injury to the church, and must not be tolerated. Nevertheless the meeting was held and a fair congregation assembled, The pro-secrecy party tried hard to interpose their authority, and prevent the discourse. They failed, and after the sermon a vote was taken whether they should have another discourse on the same subject. All but three gave a rising vote in favor. The next evening I spoke on the relations of secret societies to civil government, and had an attentive hearing. A third lecture was appointed and given; the subject being, "How a man is made a Mason." Last night (Wednesday), I gave a fifth discourse, a Gospel sermon on the conditions of success in the Gospel work.

During all of our meetings the weather has been intensely cold, and the house of worship could not be made comfortable. Still there has been a fair attendance and much interest manifested in our reform. Some pro-secrecy discourses have been given here, but none heretofore opposed to the lodge. Though the abomination that maketh desolate has been at work here, it has not achieved a victory. The truly pious members of the U. B. church will shake off this corrupting power as Paul shook off the viper into the fire. The mistaken policy of conservatism may retard, but cannot prevent the triumph of truth.

I must not omit to say that a fair collection was taken for the N. C. A., and that I am greatly indebted to the kindness of Bro. D. D. Worman and his excellent family, and to Rev. J. Stahl. May the Lord reward them.

H. H. HINMAN.

FROM THE KANSAS AGENT.

Jan. 14, 1885.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I am now detained about eleven hours, in consequence of a change of time on a branch of the B. & M. railroad at Hanover; this is trying to my patience, as I expected to get home to-night, and fear now I will not. Meanwhile I will give you a brief account of my first trip in the agency.

My success has not been flattering, and yet not such as to cause utter despair. At Topeka, Lecompton, Olathe, Winchester, Willis, and Robinson, the holiday season, protracted meetings, other lectures, etc., so occupied the people that I did uot get an opportunity to lecture; but was kindly received at every place; did what I could privately, and at every place they wished me to come again, when circumstances should be more favorable for a hearing. At the National Reform Convention at North Cedar, appointed by Rev. M. A. Gault, I was kindly requested to present the subject of anti-secrecy, and their speakers said many helpful words to the cause, and I received some pecuniary aid; for all of which I feel very thankful.

When I came to Sabetha, I found Bros. J. Thompson, G. T. Dissette and Father Coleman and son, strong in the faith. I was heartily welcomed, and kindly entertained; lectured twice in a school-house about three miles south-west of town; once in the Slauson Hall in town, and last night to a fair, and very attentive audience, about six miles west of Sabetha. At the close of the lecture an old man arose, and wished to say, that he believed Masonry to be a great evil; that all secret societies were wrong; and that he believed it was because Jefferson Davis was a highMason that he was not punished for his treason. I added that in a volume of the proceedings of the Grand Lodge of Iowa, I had the proof that he was a Mason. Bro. S. Alleman then took up a collection.

I had an appointment for Sabbath evening to preach on the lodge, in the Dunker church in Sabetha, but in the fore part of the day it stormed and turned quite cold and icy, so that we failed to get a congregation.

Hoping that the Lord will open the way more and more, I feel like pressing on. Pray for me. Yours in Christ,

R. LOGGAN.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WILL THE UNITED BRETHREN GENERAL CONFERENCE CHANGE THE RULE?

LECOMPTON, Kansas, Jan. 15, 1885.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—From what I can glean, it seems that certain wise men in the United Brethren church have made the astonishing discovery that the anti-secrecy clause of its discipline, has reference only to Freemasonry, and there is not so much cause for difference after all. Hence, all we have got to do now is to accept this interpretation. Let the minor orders take us in, reciprocate the kindness and march on to success. Would Freemasonry ever recover from such a blow?

Alas! that the church fathers and all our predecessors should have been so devoid of understanding as to misinterpret a law of their own making, and by so construing it, hinder the progress of the church. Behold the Methodist Episcopal and other churches that started out abreast, or even after ours, how they have outstripped us, numbering millions of communicants, and wealth without estimate—rich and wanting nothing! They worship at each others altars; the church pouring adoration and eulogy at the feet of the lodge, and receiving gold and silver in return. Glorious cousummation! But why discriminate against Freemasonry? Are not all secret societies of the same family or system? Most certainly. Any candid, intelligent iuvestigator will admit their common origin. Between the ancient heathen mysteries, and secret societies there plainly exists, despite all attempts to disguise the fact, a striking similarity. That Masonry holds, in most, if not all of them, a controlling influence, is painfully apparent; and that the same vein of organized secrecy, bound by an oath, expressed or implied, runs through the whole system of secret societies, is also true; which secrecy, with the penalties for violation of the same, is plainly unlawful, unnatural, unscriptural, and dangerous!

Suppose the Prohibition party would admit all the minor liquors, excluding only whisky and possibly, brandy from manufacture and sale. Would that plan abate the evils of the rum traffic, or even approximate that end? Why not? Have not these minor liquors a mildness not known to whisky, names entirely unlike it, and significant of nobler purposes, etc., etc.? Secret societies are one simply because the same deceitful, demoralizing principle pervades the whole system. Every secret society is a counterfeit of something better, or something really good: Masonry of true religion, secret temperance societies of genuine temperance work and principles—all base counterfeits of charity, benevolence, or something.

The United Brethren church is not ignorant of the arguments adduced by the ablest speakers and writers showing the evil and dangerous nature and tendency of organized secrecy. When that church and a few other bands of Christians were struggling with this deadly foe the N. C. A. was formed, and risking all the dire consequences of defeat, it rushed into the unequal contest and checked the tide of battle, fighting valiantly for the right. And now, since victory is possible, though the war still rages, for the United Brethren church to form an alliance with the lodge system or give it aid and comfort, would be a base ingratitude, and a glaring insult to the best, the most devoted and self-sacrificing element of the various churches.

From present indications, it would not be greatly wondered at if the coming General Conference would modify the anti-secrecy clause of its discipline; and yet I think not. God pity the cowardly lodge tool and traitor to Christ that would thus betray his sacred trust, and deliver the church into the hands of its enemies. Strife and division would be the inevitable result.

WHY SWEDISH LUTHERANS ABHOR MASONRY.

LUTHER ACADEMY, WAHOO, Neb.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—The correspondence from Galva, of Bro. H. H. Hinman, gratified me very much. In all the United States, from Austin, Texas; San Francisco, California; Seattle, Washington Territory, to Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and other Eastern cities, the houses of the Swedish Lutherans are always open to an anti-secret lecturer. As a church, our position in that matter is firm: no one is allowed as a member who has the chain of lodgery on his feet. Remember this, Bro. Hinman. Your kind estimation of the spirituality of our churches, was very encouraging to me. Not that the decision of man can be a foundation to build on, but because it is a universal practice of most of the English-speaking churches to picture the Lutheran church, in this country, in as dark colors as convenient. The apparent object in this is, seemingly, for the purpose of alienating its members and getting them into their fold. The Methodist and Baptist are very zealous in this, hundreds of thousands of dollars being spent annually on the support of missionaries among the Swedish Lutherans. Many a time the question has, in all earnestness, been asked me: "The Lutherans, are they not a kind of Catholics?" And that by persons of good intellect, and extensive learning!

You probably have wondered why the Swedes have not given a greater attention to this work of true Christian liberty. The reason is that our people, as a class, are not very favorable towards Masonry. In Sweden Masonry is looked upon by the common classes with a kind of superstitious awe and abhorrence. Masonry has not the power or influence there as here, because it is under complete control by the government. The king is ex-officio chief of the lodge, and the high government officials constitute the the controlling power within the lodge. Its religious aspects have lately began to be investigated, and many of the conscientious Lutheran ministers are opposing it. It is, however, only in the form of Good Templarism, as that is the one including the masses. A straight-out, old-fashioned Mason I hardly think can be found among the whole peasantry in all Sweden.

The Good Templars disclaim all conuection with Masonry; if they did not, their success in Sweden would at once be blasted. What position Masonry will occupy when the Lutheran church in Sweden shall be liberated from the crushing power of the anti-Christian element in the Riksdag, (parliament) and made a free church, is very hard to conjeeture. It is claimed that the Methodist aud Baptist missionaries, in some instances, have owed it to their standing in the lodge for some favors; but I think that is only slander.

My sympathy is always with your in your labor.

AN ODD-FELLOW'S EXPERIENCE.

CHITTENANGO STN., N. Y.

G. S. Whatkins, a member of my church at this place, told me a little of his experience in Odd-fellowship.

He said he was at that time a member of the M. E. church, and had a good experience of religion. The order was represented to him as in no way conflicting with his religious convictions, and so he allowed his name to be taken in, and finally joined a subordinate lodge, and was put through blind-folded, as is the usual form. He said it seemed to him very sacred, at first. The lessons were good, and he was particularly impressed with the shortness of human life when he saw a dead man lying in a coffin, though, as he well knew, it was only wax. Here the lesson was very impressive to his mind.

After taking the degrees in the subordinate lodge, he was induced to advance to the grand encampment. The whole outfit was handsome, and soon several encampments met at Syracuse, among them a variety of professional characters including ministers. Up to this time he still held them in pretty high estimation. While at Syracuse they were invited into a very spacious and elegant apartment to partake of refreshments of the most sumptuous nature. There were probably four hundred and fifty in all. They were all seated, a blessing was invoked, and eating began. On the middle of long tables, small demi-johns were placed, the contents of which he could not conjecture, until he was asked what he would have to drink, to which he answered that he preferred coffee, but the wise laughed at him, and said, "Take something stronger," but he for a time refused, till a minister said, "Why! take a little brandy."

To his utter astonishment those bottles contained a variety of intoxicating liquors. He took a little and felt guilty before God. Before he was converted he was in the habit of drinking very freely. This banquet at once decided on which side his interest lay. He had paid to the order about eighty dollars, and left in disgust for ever.

A member of the order stole all the costly garments of the lodge and false faces to boot, and another about three hundred dollars in cash, which broke up the lodge in Chittenango. But who got the coffin and the corpse?

The sham pilgrimage in the lodge room frought with such imminent danger, sometimes turns out to be more than play, as the above proves. I forgot to say that the drinking was when the Maine law was in operation.

I wish to extend a warm invitation to any of our lecturers to come at any time any give us a lecture on secretism at Chitteuango Station, Madison Co., N. Y. Yours, LEVI KELLY.

FROM COLORADO.

DENVER, Col.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE::—My friends may begin to reckon me a deserter from the reform ranks. I am not, so long as I am with true men marching on the highway of truth. Our cause is of God, and for humanity. We need help, and in our isolated position we would be stript of our chief armor were we deprived of the good old Cynosure. It has been a welcome guest in our home for more than thirteen years; you may enroll me for a life patron. Although financial embarrassments join with seventy-six years against me, yet will I trust in the Lord. I inclose two dollars to have the good old friend come to us as oft as possible. I trust some good has been done by the thousands of you tracts that I have carefully distributed among the people; tens of thousands would do good, to reflect light on the dark cloud which lodgery hangs over our young and growing city. I do believe an able, devoted man, would do a good work here in Denver, and elsewhere in Colorado. I have found many who are in sympathy with our reform.

I regard the inconsistency of Christian professors our strongest opposition; the United Brethren church furnishes many examples. I know whereof I speak. Honor to loyal brethren that are well harnessed for the conflict.

On several occasions I have met that same D. D., who years ago, made strong efforts to belittle our worthy editor. These men have so much of the lodge spirit they will rule or ruin. I have heard them revile and anathematize all those true reform papers, the Cynosure especially. At the Dayton convention some of them threw the old Telescope on the floor, and put their foot on it; it then being too loyal for them.

Let us pray the Lord to remove hypocritical leaders, and give the church good, honest, loyal administrators. Thousands say, amen. A. HARTZELL.

WHICH FLAG?

CHICAGO, Jan. 19.

Rev. T. E. Green, the eloquent young pastor of the 8th Presbyterian church, preached a military sermon last Sabbath morning, forcibly illustrating the powerful influence a flag has over a people, especially in time of war. Life was compared to a battle, in which the hosts of God were fighting under his banner. Every person, he said, was enlisted either under the banner of Christ or of Satan. Christian people often hesitated whether to do certain acts, whether to go to certain places, or with certain company, fearing it might not be just right. "Make them show their colors," said he, "and if theirs is the banner of Christ, you are safe." The most pertinent application of this passage in this sermon, it seemed to me, was to secret societies, although the preacher did not make it. Many Christians hesitate and doubt whether they should become members of the Masonic or other lodges. They should demand that they show their colors. As a ship at sea sends a shot across the bow of an approaching vessel to make her run up her flag, so should the Christian peremptorily demand to see what colors these societies are sailing under. If it is the black flag of the pirate, or the rebel flag of Satan, then they should steer clear of them, or enter the conflict against them. S.

AN ANCIENT SECRET SOCIETY.

BYRON, Ill.

In the twenty-third chapter of the Acts of the Apostles we have an account of an ancient lodge at Jerusalem, composed of more than forty persons. One of their former associates had turned away from them, and become a Christian, and was earnestly trying to persuade everybody to do the same. This greatly troubled them, and they resolved that the traitor should receive the traitor's doom. In trying to accomplish this they were, however, very unfortunate, for by some means a cowan got hold of their secret, and revealed it to the chief captain, and their plans were frustrated.

The Bible gives no name to this lodge, but as the Masonic institution claims very great antiquity, may we not suppose that this was a Masonic lodge? There are certain marks of resemblance that certainly deserve consideration.

In the first place, like Freemasonry, it was a secret society, from which the common people were excluded. Like the Masons, this lodge was composed wholly of men, and probably able-bodied men, too: no weaklings or women were wanted! Like the Masonic lodges, they were bound together with horrid oaths, which they esteemed more binding than their obligations to God or society. These oaths, like the Masonic, were enforced by death penalties. The object of this lodge, like that of the Masons, was to work in the dark, and secretly take the advantage of outsiders. If Masonry is as old as it is claimed to be, how can we doubt that this was a Masonic lodge, when there are so many points of resemblance? J. A. GIBSON.

LESSON VI.—February 8, 1885.—Paul assailed. Acts 21: 27-40.

NOTES FROM PELOUBET.

Paul, having arrived at Jerusalem, found there a strong element of opposition to him on account of his teaching that the Gentiles need not adopt the Jewish law and ritual, and that even the Jews were not saved as Jews, but simply by such faith in the Messiah as led to new hearts and holy lives. The Jews, who were zealous of their law everywhere, resented this teaching, and aroused an opposition to him as if he were an apostate Jew, and an enemy to the Jewish religion and race. In order to show that this opposition was founded on a slander, and that he was not opposed to the Jewish laws for Jews, he joined with four men who were about to complete their Nazarite vow, and publicly in the temple practiced the regular Jewish ceremonial. His example was the answer to the slander. It satisfied the Christian Jews, not the unbelievers. It was during these ceremonies that the events of this lesson took place.—Peloubet.

"Stirred up the people." It was natural that these Ephesian Jews who had opposed Paul for years, who had just come in from a long and intense controversy with him, and had seen the success of his labors against them, should be the leaders in this attack upon their old opponent.—Peloubet.

"And laid hands on him." Not a legal arrest, for they had no authority, but the beginning of the mob violence. —Peloubet. As it was, they seized him with all the tokens of his purification still upon him (comp. chap. 24: 18), about to offer sacrifices, and raised a cry which was sure to throw the whole city into an uproar.—Plumptre.

"And hath polluted this holy place." By bringing Greeks, i. e. uncircumcised Gentiles, into the Holy Place, i. e. beyond the middle wall of partition which divided the court that was open to strangers from that which none but Jews might enter (Jos., Ant. xv. 11 §5). The recent excavations of the Palestine Excavation Society (Report for 1871, p. 132) have brought to light a slab with an inscription, discovered and deciphered by M. Clermont Ganneau, which illustrates the horror with which the Jews looked on such a profanation. Its contents show that it must have formed part of the low wall just mentioned: "No man of alien race is to enter within the balustrade and fence that goes round the temple. If any one is taken in the act, let him know that he has himself to blame for the penalty of death that follows." This, accordingly, was the punishment which the Jews of Asia were now seeking to bring on St. Paul and on his friends. —Plumptre.

"The people ran together." Better, perhaps, there was a rush of the people. Paul would, in all likelihood, have been killed on the spot, but that the assailants were unwilling to pollute the temple with blood.—Kitto. They strained at gnats and swallowed camels, as they had done in the case of the Lord himself.—Williger.

"Forthwith the doors were shut." This was obviously the act of the Levite gate-keepers. The doors were those of the gate Beautiful, between the court of the women and the court of the Gentiles. They were of Corinthian brass, 60 feet high, and it took twenty men to shut them. —Lewin.

"Centurions." Captains of a company of a hundred men. The Roman guard was stationed on the roof of the western cloister, ready for any emergeucy.—Lewin. Learn, (1) a heathen may often be the protector of a Christian; (2) the usefulness of a government, however severe.—Bib. Museum.

"Bound with two chains." One from each of his arms to a soldier on each side of him (comp. chap. 12: 6). This secured the prisoner, yet left him free to walk away with his guards when the detachment was marched off.—Riddle. The prophecy of Agabus was here fulfilled (chap. 21: 11). The chains were at hand because, as Josephus states, every Roman soldier carried with him a chain and also a thong.—Lewin.

"And some cried one thing, some another." Nothing more confounds some men than to be forced to give a distinct reason for a course pursued in the heat of passion.—Bib. Museum.

"And when he came upon the stairs." Which led from the court of the Gentiles to the top of one of the cloisters adjoining the castle of Antonia. The castle, being near the northwest corner of the temple area, was connected with the western and northern cloisters of the outer temple by two colonnades, called the limbs or legs, one running from Antonia to the northern extremity of the western cloister of the temple and the other running to about the middle of the northern cloister of the temple. Where the two colonnades abutted on Fort Antonia, stairs led srom the castle to the roof of the cloisters, and of course stairs from the cloisters into the outer court of the temple. It was to one of these latter stairs that Paul was borne.—Lewin.

"Canst thou speak Greek?" Literally, dost thou know Greek? This implies that Paul had addressed the chief captain in that language, which was a surprise, since the officer had held him to be a very different person; possibly of a lower class than those who were familiar with the language of the refined world.—Riddle.

"Art not thou that Egyptian?" The Egyptian whom the chief captain took St. Paul to be is mentioned by Josephus. A short time before this, probably at Pentecost, two months before (Lewin), he had gathered a large body of discontented Jews on Mount Olivet, whom he had deluded into the belief that he was the Messiah, declaring that the walls of Jerusalem would fall at his word. Felix marched out against the insurgents and dispersed them, but the Egyptian escaped. Among his followers were 4,000 of the Sicarii, a numerous band of brigands, who stabbed people in open day in the streets of Jerusalem; and the words of Lysias in verse 38 are literally "those four thousand men of the Sicarii."—Stock. The name Sicarii (assassins) was derived from sica, a daggar or short sword these robbers wore beneath their clothing. These may be compared to the Thugs of India, a secret society of murderers who spread terror till they were suppressed by Lord Bentinck (1830).—Rev. Com.

"I beseech thee, suffer me to speak." Observe the indications of Paul's self-possession, confidence in his cause, native dignity, and personal power. Unawed by the mob, he desires to address them; by his personal weight secures permission; and there, chained to the soldiers, his hair and garments still disordered by the rough handling, with a gesture he silences the crowd and secures an audience. We no longer wonder that this man wished to go into the theater at Ephesus and face the mob.—Abbott.

—The missionary spirit is the spirit of Christ; the soul or church that does not possess it is dead.—Scudder.

—The total national debt of the world, in 1713, was $595,000,000. In 1793 they had risen to $1,415,000,000; in 1798, to $2,845,000,000; in 1816. to $7,185,000,000; in 1848, to $8,245,000,000; in 1870, to $19,150,000,000, and in 1884, they have reached the awful aggregate of $27,155,000,000.—Mulhall.

—Bro. I. D. Wellcome of Bath, Maine, has prepared and printed an excellent little tract entitled "Are you a Christian." One of the evidences is this: "You either keep out or come out of all secret societies (2 Cor. 6: 14–18; Eph. 5: 11–15"). This tract is worth circulating by the hundred thousand.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.
2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.
3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.
4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.
5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.
7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.
8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.
9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved invlolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.
10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.
11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.
12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.
13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.
14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.
15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

The Christian Cynosure.

EDITORS.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, JANUARY 29, 1885.

THE SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS.—An evil genius has suggested to this worthy people, that the Cynosure would sanction laws to punish those who keep Saturday holy, and for working on Sunday. No such doctrine has been, or will be, taugh tby the Cynosure, which teaches, "God alone is Lord of the conscience, and hath left it free from the doctrines and commandments of men." When the fourth commandment was given from the top of Sinai, it would have taken just two days, Saturday and Sunday, to have kept one Sabbath day around the globe.

SWEDISH FREE CHURCHS.—CORRECTION.—In the Cynosure, Jan. 15, in the article, "Mormonism, Masonry and Congregationalism," we did unintentional injustice to Secretary M. W. Montgomery, of the Scandinavian Missions. On a more careful perusal of his interesting report, we are rejoiced to find on pages 97 and 99, two strong condemnations of "Freemasonry," taken from the writings of Dr. Waldenstrom, which, as he speaks for all the Swedish Free churches, show that those churches contain more than one hundred thousand Christians committed against the secret lodges. We hope for letters from their ministers which will introduce to our readers that marvelously interesting people.

LABOR ORGANIZATIONS.

An able article on this subject is given in the North American Review for January, from the pen of Richard J. Hinton, a strong Labor Unionist.

This writer, who advocates arbitration, not strikes; and law and order, not anarchy, is of course embarrassed by the secrecy of Labor Unions; but he gathers and gives proximate tables from which he infers that:

"Labor organizations embrace fully one-fifth of the skilled wage-workers" in iron, steel, engineering, carpentering, type-setting, sea-industries, cigar-making, coopering, brick and stone masonry, house-painting, shoemaking, brewers (he does not mention distillers and liquor men), etc., etc.

The platforms of some of these organizations are given, and contain much that is sound and necessary, with much unsound and bad. Mr. Hinton says, "Thinking men in the labor ranks are more or less imbued with Socialist ideas, as the Henry George state-ownership of the land, Karl Marx common property in railroads, telegraphs and banks, land, mines and waters, and Lasalle's ideas of the state owning machinery and business so as to dispense with capitalists and capitalism."

These unions run seventeen monthlies, one daily and seven weeklies. And Hinton thinks these immense orgrnized masses are tending toward federation. A federal body met in Chicago last October, representing nine labor crafts, and several secret lalor orders.

The Cynosure is not unfriendly to the efforts of laboring men, by legitimate organization, to watch over and protect their interests from the greed of organized capital. Nor do we expect such organizations to arise at once complete in wisdom and perfect in prudence.

The difficulties and dangers in their way are many and vast:

1. Lavbrers have less leisure and less knowledge than employers.

2. "The rich answereth roughly." "The poor useth entreaties."

3. Hence labor organizatious offer a field for and invite quacks, idlers, the lazy, the impudent, and all who are inclined to general "cussedness," to join them.

4. But over and above all, the necessities of organization to keep great promiscuous masses of men together so as to effect a common end and object, secrecy, superstition and curiosity, instead of reason and intelligence, for the obvious cause that reason and intelligence will be wanting in miners who work underground and out of sight. Five millions of American laborers cannot write or read a vote; and other millions do not know precisely what it means; and the devil and his myriad agents stand ready to put stumbling-blocks before the blind. All the ancient guilds catalogued in the old British encyclopedias put on "mystery," practiced devil-worship, and as soon as they had money, got "A nobleman to their chairman," who loved laborers as vultures love lambs.

When the writer employed thirty mechanics on the college building at Wheaton, many were drawn into Chicago by the offer of five dollars a day through the summer and fall. The following winter a labor organization led by a former German Wheaton student, who "believed Jesus the greatest of magicians," resolved, "That we supply our families and send the bills to the City Treasury."

Christ and his apostles were an organization of laborers; and every constitution of a labor-organization is a fraud which leaves out the Ten Commandments and the example of Christ, who "spake nothing in secret." The platform of the American party is therefore the only proper and safe constitution for a labor-organization, and that is safe. If the third article: "That God requires aud man needs a Sabbath;" and the fourth, demanding the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks," were carried by the majority electing our Presidents, eight hours a day for some sorts of labor might do. But, as things now are, besides the folly of stopping the load of hay in the middle of the afternoon, and the railway train before it gets to the depot, the grog-shops and small lawyers who defend plain murder and assassination would be the chief gainers by "the eight hour law."

Still, as we have already said, imperfect labor agitation is better than none: though, as we once heard Henry Vincent say in England, "Every strong-winged, stray bird of genius who soars above the masses which hatched him, is regularly caught and cooped and bribed by the aristocracy." Still labor agitation has done good even in England. Corn laws sometimes fail, the ballot moves steadily towards the masses; and now and then a Cobden and Bright refuse titles and orders.

The need of labor-agitation increases with the progress of society. Pickens of South Carolina, said in the slavery debate, "When society is pressed down into classifications, the upper class will own the laborers in some shape or form;" and this is true where greed is gospel and gain is law. Machinery and increased population raise the price of land and make the travel longer from the laborer to the owner. But ten thousand side doors open up all the way from labor to capital, and every virtuous young man or girl holds a key to some of those doors. The talented young man controls the employer, and the prudent girl marries his son. Death disperses riches and clerks inherit them; and if the accursed drainage of secretism and strong drink was once stopped the devil would lose his worship, and the liquor seller his coach; reason would gently return to the masses, and the angel having the key of the bottomless pit to lock Satan away from society become not only a beautiful revelation but a fact.

CHRIST'S COMING AGAIN.

A good brother, Noe, of Layton, Hendricks county, Indiana, wishes us to explain our editorial of Jan. 8th, where we said "Christ's second coming is not a Scriptural phrase;" and he nearly convicts us of a mistake, by citing Heb. 9: 28: "Unto those that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation." To us, however, there is a difference between Chrits's "appearing a second time" to "them that look for him," and the phrase so constantly repeated, "Christ's second coming," as though that, and that only, was all we have to look for. We certainly agree with our good brother that Christ will "appear the second time," to "them that look for him." We said Jan. 8th, "Every one of his predicted comings will be fulfilled." We verily believe Christ will "so come" as the disciples saw him "go into heaven," Acts 1: 11. That he shall "descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God" (1 Thess. 4: 16); that he will "come with clouds, and every eye shall see him, and they also that pierced him; and all kindreds of the earth wail because of him;" that he will come in his glory," and "sit in the throne of his glory," and summon all nations to judgment: with mauy more similar Scriptures whose bare recital must fill every feeling, rational mind with awe unutterable.

But whether these and other Scriptures which depict his comings in terms, and with imagry so august that one almost holds his breath to read them mean just one sublime "second coming;" or whether there will be manifold comings till all be fulfilled, we know not. He came on the mount, by the sea, at Emmaus, and amid terrible splendor to Isaiah, (chap. 6) and to Ezekiel (chap. 1). But "his ways are unsearchable," "past finding out!" "It is the glory of God to conceal a thing;" and he has purposely concealed the time and manner of his comings. Let us be preparing his way; and live so we shall be glad to see him any hour.

MASSACHUSETTS STATE MEETING.

A dispatch from Rev. D. McFall, of the Massachusetts State Christian Association executive committee, announces the appointment of the State convention at Reading, just north of Boston, on Tuesday and Wednesday of next week. See the notice elsewhere, and let the old Bay State surprise herself with numbers and enthusiasm. It has been some time since the Massachusetts friends have held a convention. Let there be full amend made for the long rest. The lodge has not during this time ceased dragging its half-clad victims under its yoke nor remitted a single meeting. The devil is not inactive, let not those who have enlisted for Christ be lacking courage and zeal. Go to Reading next Wednesday, Massachusetts friends, in prayerful earnest. There will be a good meeting, you cannot afford to lose it.

A MISSIONARY ERA.

The departure of forty missionaries from New York for the interior of Africa last week, independent of the financial support of a missionary society, is but one of numerous indications of a mighty awakening to the importance of the world's evangelization. The appeal on our third page from Lord Radstock, the pastors, Bonar and Marston, and the well-known George Muller should be heard in every part of Christendom. "Let us go up and possess the land," writes Pres. A. G. Haygood, in a similar appeal a short time ago, urging the church to behold her mission in the command of Christ to "Go ye into all the world."

The New York company have been aroused by the powerful appeals of William Taylor, and he goes with them to inaugurate the work. He has appealed for no funds except to pay their passage. The land must support them, and their faith in the Almighty One who has promised to care for those who serve him.

The Independent notices a unexpected and unique missionary movement begun by the "liberal" sections of the German church, who have been roused to emulate the work of the orthodox churches and have organized to prosecute missionary work form their standpoint. A number of professors iu the universities of Jena and Heidelberg are leading in the movement. They do not wish to be considered as an opposition to the existing societies. On the contrary, in its appeal the society ackuowledges the duty devolving upon all Christianity of engaging in mission work, and recognizes "with the highest regard and gratitude, the great blessing which the mission work so far has achieved." For the present no missionaries are to be sent out; "but the effort will be made, through scientific work, to appeal to the edu cated classes in the Gentile world, upon whom the missions of to-day have had little or no influence."

While such builders seem to have begun a structure with the most perishable materials, their attempt is the strongest proof of the genuine character of Christian missions.

—Can any of the Cynosure readers inform us if Rev. Lebbeus Armstrong, the Presbyterian minister who seceded from the Masonic lodge after taking twenty-one degrees, and who wrote the powerful discourse, "Masonry a Work of Darkness," preached once in Moreau, Saratoga county, New York, and at what time?

—Bro. David Yant of Bolivia, Ohio, writes that the late lecture in that place, by the N. C. A. Secretary aroused the lodgeites exceedingly, and produced much discussion in public places—a result Masonry always seeks to avoid. The lodge lays much blame upon Bro. Yant, but he is sustained nobly by Revs. Mr. Weaver and A. R. Smith, who approve the discussion of the lodge on the New Testament principles.

—The Faithful Witness published monthly, by W. H. Litzenberg, at South Oil City, Pa., still in its first volume, publishes a welcome testimony against the secret lodge. Let it be read rejoicing:

"The Christian Cynosure has been received, and we believe we would not prove a Faithful Witness if we did not add our full endorsement to its principles. Although we have never felt called to enter the field on that line entirely, yet we wish to say that when the writer hereof was saved, the work was complete as far as secret societies were concerned. We believe, in fact we KNOW, we could not please God by retaining membership in a society where the name of Jesus is ignored. Union with God, means separation from the world."

—The fine picture of the Ice Palace, which was opened at Montreal, on Monday, is given our readers through the courtesy of the Inter Ocean of this city. We wish to add a word to the advertisemeut of this daily, published a week or two since. After a number of years' acquaintance with the daily press of Chicago, we ean recommend the Inter Ocean as the safest, fairest and best of them all. Its superiority is most marked in its editorial pages, while the exeellence of its correspondence has given it a leading circulation in the Western States and Territories.

—Secretary Stoddard left Chicago for New York State on Friday, the 16th inst. The snow and extreme eold put an embargo on railway travel, and his train made only thirty-six miles in sixteen hours, and he had to stop in Salamanca, N. Y., over Sabbath. He attended the State meeting at Fredonia, last week and is this week in Willimantic, Conn.; next week he expects to attend the Massachusetts State Convention at Reading, on Tuesday and Wednesday.

—Bro. K. A. Orvis of Columbus, Ohio, heartily endorses the proposed State Convention in Ohio, and promises his aid in personal effort, and $10 from his pocket for the State work. He regards Columbus as a favorable place for the meeting, and suggests that enquiry be made respecting hall, entertainment, etc., before fixing upon another location.

—Bro. S. E. Starry ealled at the Cynosure office on his way to the New York State convention, Wednesday last, having been delayed in the beginning of his journey. The trains failed to get through to the East in time also, and he reached Fredonia after the final adjournment. Bills were got out, however, and a meeting was held Friday evening, in which he exemplified the lodge work. The New York friends expect to keep him at work for some time.

—Rev. I. Bancroft, who has pledged $10 per month for this year to the Wisconsin State work, writes: "Say to the good people of Wisconsin if my proposition is not responded to soon by other friends offering what they can, I may withdraw it in favor of some other State."

—The first number of the Birmingham, Iowa, Free Press is just received. Congratulations to the worthy editors, Dr. J. N. Norris and Rev. George Warrington. The first number promises the lodges of southeastern Iowa a fair, but an earnest battle. May the Free Press flag never be struck, and may its "Unconditional Surrender" thunder at every lodge door until it opens never to shut—even those to whom it gives the privilege of its columns. Look out about warming a viper, there, brethren.

TO THE FRIENDS OF THE CAUSE IN OHIO.

An effort is being made for a forward movement in our State. Circulars and pledges are being sent out as fast as names and addresses can be obtained. It is hoped that a large number will enroll themselves by filling out the blank pledges and returning them. Brother Stoddard, the General Agent of the N. C. A., has promised to spend some time in Ohio during March, and it is hoped that a good and enthusiastic State Convention may be held in the latter part of March or the first part of April. Where shall it be held? Let friends throughout the State answer through the Cynosure. It ought to be central, that it may be well attended, and it ought to be where it will have a good local support. We would be glad to hear from a number, showing the advantages of different localities. S. A. GEORGE, Sec. O. C. A.

FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

THE NEW YORK CONVENTION.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Jan. 23d.

With Bro. Capwell I am waiting for a train to future appointments, and will just send a word from the meetings at Dunkirk. The Chautauqua County Association re-organized on the 21st and has resolved not only to live but to work. Having completed the county business Bro. J. E. Vineent vacated the chair and Bro. Capwell, president of the State Association, called the convention to order and made a few pointed remarks. W. B. Stoddard gave a summary of his year's work and submitted suggestions for future operations. The necessary eommittees were appointed and time was given to a general exehange of experienee.

In the evening after a half hour's devotional exereises eonducted by Rev. Bro. Dunham, Pres. Capwell announced a disappointment in the non-appearance of Bro. Starry, and called upon the writer to "fill the breech," which he did to the best of his ability. There was a fair audience which remained quiet and attentive for an hour and a quarter listening to a diseription of the first degree of Freemasonry. At the close of my remarks Bro. Mallory, who had taken three degrees in a "regularly eonstituted lodge," testified to the eorreetness of the work done; so that what would otherwise have been a serious disappointment, was slightly relieved.

On the morning of the 22d, most of those present the day defore answered the roll call, but neither Bro. Starry, Pres. C. A. Blanchard, Rev. B. T. Roberts or Rev. N. Wordner had been heard from. The forenoon was largely oceupied with business, and short speeches, but with the temperature below zero and no tidings from speakers east or west, the enthusiasm was only moderate. The afternoon mails brought no word from those expected to edify and instruet the evening audience by an exhibition of the "Sublime degree" of Masonry, it was decided to adjourn subject to the call of the executive committee and to give all who wished an opportunity to attend a prohibition convention in progress in Temperance Hall in the same building. The prohibition convention was addressed by W. H. H. Bartrum of New Jersey, and right well did he plead the cause of prohibition. Every one attending was well repaid

At this meeting after the anti-secrecy convention had adjourned Bro. Starry put in an appearance to meet a hearty welcome at that late hour and after being in perils of snow and storm. A hall was seeured, bills struck, and all necessary arrangements made for the third degree to-night, and such of the brethren as had not already left and could remain are with him to help put a fitting period to the annual gathering which is not to be accounted a failure.

There was much more business done in this than is the wont in State conventions, and I predict a better state of affairs in the future than in the past. The officers eleeted were Pres. Franklin W. Capwell, Dale; Viee-president, Rev. G. W. Sibley; Recording Secretary, Robert Parring, Jamestown; Corresponding Secretary, Joseph E. Vincent, Hamlet; Treasurer, Peter D. Miller, Wright's Corners, Niagara Co.

LITERATURE.

STORIES FOR HOME FOLKS, YOUNG AND OLD, by Grace Greenwood, pp. 185, Price 50c. John B. Alden, 393 Pearl St., New York.

Hundreds of thousands have been charmed and their hearts made better and more tender to the touch of human sympathy by the writings and leetures of "Graee Greenwood," and the reading public will welcome this fine addition to the earlier children of her pen. No one will read these stories of mothers' love, of ehildhood's devotion, of the nobility of true friendship, without aspirations for a better life. The first of the sketches is a true story of the war which shows the great heart of Abraham Lincoln in the time of its greatest trial, yet as tender as a woman's.

In the North American Review for February, the question "How shall the President be Elected?" is ably diseussed by five writers: Senators Dawes and Vanec; Pres. F. A. P. Barnard of Columbia College; a New York lawyer, Roger A. Pryor; and a well-known journalist, William Purcell. The substantial agreement of four of them on the same point is significant. Pres. Barnard's article is the longest and most exhaustive, he having been the author of a proposition to substitute for the Electoral College the vote of the lower houses of the State Legislatures. The veteran historian, George Bancroft, writes a review of G. W. Holmes's life of Emerson. Prof. C. A. Young writes in a popular manner of the "Theories of the Venus Corona;" and Prof. G. Stanley Hall on "New Departures in Education," ably defending an equal attention to the moral as well as intellectual training of children. The ablest article of the number is by Prof. W. G. T. Shedd, D. D., of Union Theologieal Seminary, on the "Certainty of Endless Punishment," in which the argument from the reason of the case is very clearly and forcibly stated. A discussion by Dr. H. J. Van Dyke, Jr., and Rev. H. W. Beecher, "Shall Clergymen be Politicians?" closes the number.

Gregory's annual seed catalogue for 1885 is a complete descriptive and illustrated list of vegetables, flowers and grain. The Gregory seeds stand among the highest for germinating qualities. Some specialties are presented this year. The catalogue is sent to any gardner free by J. J. H. Gregory, Marblehead, Mass.

The books printed in the South during the war are now in demand among collectors. One of these was a spelling book printed on common wall paper. Another, more ambitious, was illustrated with the old trade cuts found in newspaper offices, producing a eomical effect. Upon the title page is the legend: "Printed in the fourth year of the war of independence."

STAR NOTES.

SATURN'S MOVEMENTS AND RINGS.

Conspicuous among the brilliant heavenly bodies, which every clear evening shows us now, is the planet Saturn, the first star brought out by the fading twilight, directly in the east. In appearance less white than the great sun, Sirius, low in the southeast, less ruddy than Betelgenx, to the east, it is about the same in color and brightness as Capella, to the north. Its motion through the sky is interrupted by annual gyrations, or retrograde movements; which so puzzled the ancient astronomers, but are now known to be due to our earth's orbital motion. The backward motion began early in October, when Saturn was a little below Zeta Tauri, the 3d magnitude star now about four degrees east of the planet; and will continue till the latter part of February, when the planet will resume its slow progress, never to return to that part of the heavens till a generation of men has passed from the earth. The apparent forward motion may be roughly indicated by a line from Eta Tauri to a point one degree below Zeta. Eta is the upper star of the Hyades, the V-shaped cluster. It will be noticed that Saturn is not now on this line, as it would be if the earth and Saturn moved in the same plane. But the difference will be more noticeable when Saturn comes into conjunction with Zeta again in May, as it will pass then to the north of that star instead of the south, as in October. This inclination of the orbits of Saturn and the earth is so slight, however, that Saturn will never be found more than two degrees from the Ecliptic, the earth's path in the heavens, or the apparent path of the sun. So the sun will pass on June 9th very near to where Saturn is now.

The most novel feature of this planet, and perhaps the most wonderful in the whole heavens, is the ring. Concealed from our sight by its great distance, it is yet disclosed by a low magnifying power; indeed, when the ring is so open as at present, it can be seen with a spy glass a foot and a half long, furnished with some kind of a stand to hold and move it steadily. For six years now, the ring will gradually diminish in width, to a mere line, when it will turn and gradually show us the other side. Is this where Ezekiel found his simile of awheel within a wheel? A GAP WELL FILLED

NEWARK, Ill., Jan. 21st, 1885.

I have just noticed in last number of Cynosure Geo. O. Robinson's discontinuance of the paper because you supported St. John in late campaign.

I want to take Robinson's place as a paying subscriber for the same reason for which he quits. Last year (1884) was the first I ever saw or read much of the Cynosure. Two Baptist friends paid for it for me and I received and read it regularly. I had previously had the paper represented to me as narrow, sour, and bitter, and in general unreliable. And although in sympathy with the especial reform it advocates (hostility to secret societies), I yet was unprepared to subscribe for it. My regular reading of the paper, together with my observation of the spirit of its accusers, has led me to think it not only fair but magnanimous. Its course in late campaign was a continual source of pleasure to me, chiefly because of this spirit which it manifested; and while the paper continues earnest yet kind, radieal yet generous and fair, especially toward the Prohibition party—in short Christian, as it is named, and as I believe it to be, it may eount me as its friend and subscriber.

Enclosed find amount to cover year 1885. Your Bro. in Christ. H. R. ANTES,

OBITUARY.

Alvah Warner went to Heaven from Gilboa, N. Y., Nov. 1, 1884, aged nearly 53 years.

He was very clearly converted when quite young. He lived in the experience of entire sanctification upwards of forty years. He severed his connection with the church of his former choice some ten years since, preferring to be connected with a body of true believers who made non-attendance with secret societies a test of membership. His opposition to secretism and kindred evils was very great. The writer visited him in his dying moments and found him very happy in God. He remarked, "If I live I am the Lord's; if I die I am the Lord's." His sun went down while it was yet day. "There is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel."

CHRIST'S SYMPATHY FOR WEAK SOULS.

"A bruised reed will he not break, and the smoking flax will he no quench." Matt. 12: 20.

When evening choirs their praises hymned,
In Zion's courts of old,
The High Priest walked his rounds and trimmed
The shining lamps of gold;
And if perchance the flame burned low,
By fresh oil vainly drenched,
He cleansed it from the socket, so
The smoking flax was quenched.

But thou who walkest, Priest Most High,
Thy golden lamps among;
What things are weak and near to die,
Thou makest fresh and strong;
Thou breathest on the trembling spark,
That else would soon expire,
And straight it shoots up through the dark,
A brilliant spear of fire.

The ancient shepherd as he strayed,
Among his flock at noon,
On reedy pipe soft music made,
In many a pastoral tune;
But if perchance the reed were crushed,
And could no more be used,
Its mellow music waned and hushed.
He brake it when so bruised.

But thou, good Shepherd, who dost lead
Thy flock in pastures green,
Thou dost not break the bruised reed,
That sorely crushed hath been;
The heart that dumb in anguish lies,
Or yields but notes of woe,
Thou dost re-tune to harmonies,
More sweet than angels know.

Lord, once my love was all ablaze,
But now it burns so dim;
My life was praise, but now my days
Make a poor broken hymn;
Yet ne'er by thee am I forgot,
But helped in sorest need;
The smoking flax thou quenchest not,
Nor breake'st the bruised reed.

THAT FAMILY ALTAR.

In many a home there was once an altar that is not to be found there now. Around it the family was daily gathered, and incense was offered thereon by the head of the household. But it has long been in the condition of the altar of the Lord which Elijah repaired that was "broked down." For months, and for years it may be, it has been unused. It is long since the blessed Word of God was opened and read, and the family, parents and children, bowed around it, and there poured forth their united supplications to the great Father of all.

And why has it been so? One excuse and another may have been assigned, but the grand reason has been a decline of piety, a loss of spirituality. And what has been the result? Has there been a gain or a loss? There has been no gain certainly. There is never a gain in the neglect of any duties towards God, for "godliness is profitable unto all things." There has been no gain temporally, nor has there been any spiritually. The children have been none the better for it; nor have matters thriven any better in any respect. Rather has it been for the worse. As the Lord blessed the house of Obed-edom, and all that he had, because of the ark that abode there, so does he bless the household in all its affairs more abundantly because of the altar around which they daily seek his favor. His promise is, "Them that honor me I will honor." God's eye has ever been on that family altar. It was upon it so long as it was a used altar, and he beheld it with satisfaction. His eye was also upon it when it was "broken down," and it has been upon it all the while that it has lain in ruins, and with disapproval. And, my dear friend, if you would regain his approval, and if you would have it to be with you and with your family as it was in months that are past, you must hasten to repair and to rebuild that altar, and you must never allow it to go down again. Bring up your children around it, and as they shall grow up and go forth into the world it shall be among their most pleasant remembrances and one of their strongest safeguards.—American Messenger.

SIGNS OF SPIRITUAL DECLINE.

1. When you are averse to religious conversation or the company of heavenly minded Christians.
2. When, without necessity, you absent yourself from religious services.
3. When you are more concerned about pacifying conscience than of honoring Christ in performing duty.
4. When you are more afraid of being counted over-strict than of dishonoring Christ.
5. When you trifle with temptation, or think lightly of sin.
5. When the faults of others are more a matter of censorious conversation than secret grief and prayer.
7. When you are impatient and unforgiving to others.
8. When you confess but do not forsake sin, and when you acknowledge but still neglect duty.
9. When your cheerfulness has more of the levity of the unregenerate than the holy joy of the children of God.
10. When you shrink from self-examination.
11. When the sorrows and cares of the world follow you further into the Sabbath than the Saviour of the Sabbath follows you into the week.
12. When you are easily prevailed upon to let your duty as a Christian yield to your worldly interests or the opinions of your neighbors.
13. When you associate with men of the world without solicitude of doing good or fear of having your own spiritual life injured.—Selected.

CALMNESS OF SPIRIT.

Calmness and equanimity ought to be a part of every one's religion. "I dare no more fret," said John Wesley, "than to curse and swear." One who knew him well said he never saw him low-spirited or fretful in his life. He could not endure the society of people who were of this habit. He says of them: "To have persons at my ears murmuring and fretting at everything is like tearing the flesh from my bones. By the grace of God, I am discontented at nothing. I see God sitting on the throne and ruling all things."

If every one was of this spirit, it would wonderfully improve the world. Christians lose their wayside comforts, and dishonor their Master, by their fretfulness over little troubles. Some who can bear the great sorrows of life with a martyr's faith and patience will even show anger over the loss of a button, the mislaying of a cane, or fifteen minutes' delay of dinner, though they have stood calmly by the graves of dear ones gone, and comforted others whose hearts were breaking with grief.

Doubtless physical infirmity is a cause of much of the agitation and fretfulness which many good people exhibit, but they must guard against this. Not only must they watch against yielding to such things, but they must watch against the overwork, the stimulation, the excess, the gluttony, and the dyspepsia, which rob men of peace, and which leave them nervous, fretful and impatient. God would have us well. It is small credit to a watchmaker to have his watches continually out of order, even though it may wholly be the fault of those who carry them; and the perpetual sickness and fretfulness of Christians does not honor him whose apostle has said, "Glorify God in your body."—Christian Progress.

THE GREAT DIVIDER.

"As the cross of Christ separated the penitent and believing malefactor, from the impenitent and unbelieving one of Calvary, so it has continued ever since to separate the army of believers from the army of unbelievers."

The above paragraph, from some evidently clear headed and sound Christian writer, contains a suggestion of great practical importance. The Cross of Christ stands between the evangelical church of Christ, and all systems of rationalistic or merely moral religion. The cross and all that it signifies, namely, salvation by the blood of Christ, is completely excluded from false religions; yes, even from that religion which, while it lavishly glories in the symbols of the cross, conceals the all sufficiency of Christ's atoning sacrifices, and practices the impiety of pretending to repeat it daily. To make a sacerdotal caste the custodian of the saving power of Christ's vicarious atonement, to be retailed out at its pleasure for money, is the height of blasphemy.

Dear friends, before you join any church or association, be sure you find out on which side of its door is the cross of Christ, and the ONE who hung thereon! It is not enough to have a priest, however exalted, inside the door, nor yet a Grand Master.—N. Y. Witness.

SPEAKING THE TRUTH IN LOVE.

"You see, auntie, our teacher gave every one of us girls a motto for the new year. They were perfectly lovely, I mean the way she made them; all hand-painted on little easels, to stand on your bureau, where you'd see 'em the first thing every morning. Each one was different; mine had bluebells and lilies of the valley, just a dainty little handful that looked as if somebody had laid them down for a minute, and under them the motto, 'Speaking the truth in love.'

"I liked it best of all, and I thought that motto would be easy enough to live by, because, truly, Aunt Mary, I never do tell lies, not even the least little bit of fibs, and I just despise folks that do. But I've found out one thing: there's most always a good deal more in Bible verses than just what's on top, and that's the way it came out with my motto.

"First thing when I got to school, there was Gracie Harter, as proud as a peacock, with the very unbecomingest hood on that I ever did see: deep blue velvet trimmed with swan's down, and she a black, little dingy thing. Of course she had to run up to me and say, 'See my new hood; it came last night by express; isn't it lovely?'

"Now, Aunt Mary, what should you think I ought to say?"

"Nothing that was not true, of course"—

"Well, just let me tell you. I didn't even think of my motto, because I always do say what I think right out, and I was just going to say how unbecoming it was, when Lottie Richards spoke up and said, 'Isn't it a beautiful shade of blue; just what I wanted for my hat, but mamma couldn't find it; may I try it on, Gracie?"

"'Course Gracie said yes, pleased as could be, and when she saw how sweet it looked on Lottie's yellow curls her eyes just daneed."

"'My papa bought it for me in the city,' she said. 'Mamma was sorry he didn't get red, but we wouldn't tell him so, 'cause he liked it and kept it a secret to please me. I wanted red at first, but I don't now; I didn't know it was so pretty.'

"Do you see, auntie, the little goosie didn't know that it was Lottie's pink cheeks and blue eyes that made the hood so pretty. I kept thinking and thinking and couldn't quite make it out, and at recess I asked Lottie if she really thought Gracie looked nice in that hood, and she said: "Why no; it isn't very becoming, but it is pretty and warm, and her papa chose it, and she will have to wear it, so I want to help her to be happy in it.'

"'Well, I said, 'I was just going to tell her she looked as black as a thunder cloud in it, and that's the truth.'

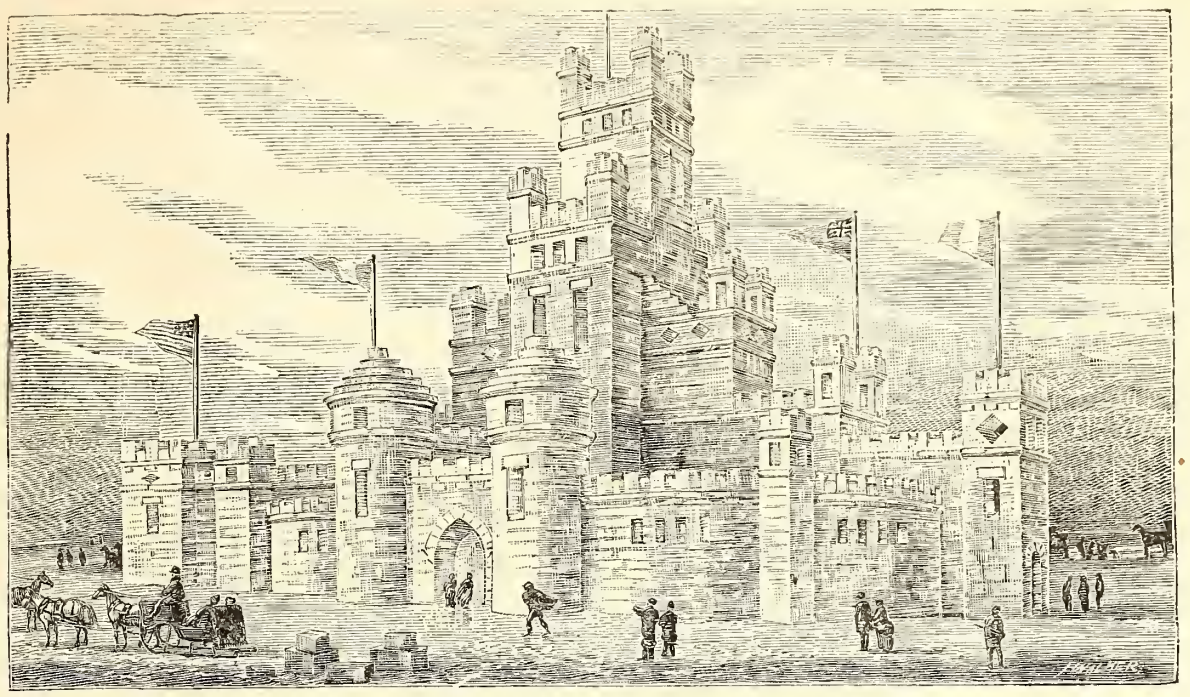
"'I was afraid you would say something,' said Lottie; that's why I spoke; you know my motto is, 'Bear ye one another's burdens.'

"'But that velvet hood isn't a burden; at least Gracie doesn't think so.'

"'No, but don't you see how easy it would be to make it a burden by laughing at it? I don't s'pose you're so silly, but I'll just tell you, Mamie, I've cried many a time about having to wear my brown merino, because you said I looked like the picture of the Goose Girl in it.'

"I felt awfully shamed, auntie, because Lottie is my very dearest friend, and I wouldn't hurt her feelings for anything. I asked Lottie if she didn't think we ought to tell people anything but what would please them, and she said of course sometimes we would have to, and that's all the time we had to talk about it then.

"After that I began to understand a little better that speaking the truth in love meant not to say disagreeable things even if they were true, when it was not necessary to say 'em and would only make people unhappy. That was the first thing I found out in my motto, but that wasn't all.



"There's a girl in school—I guess I won't tell her name, because that wouldn't be the truth in love—and hardly anybody really liked her, though she didn't get mad, and had lots of goodies and always divided, but she cheated in her lessons the worst way, and I should think if I was Miss Porter I'd have found her out before this time. She put all history dates on paper and fastened it on her cuff and did all sorts of tricks like that. One day some of us were talking about it, and Laura May said somebody ought to tell Miss Porter. But Lottie said no, the way was to tell M-m—I was just going to say her nome. We all said we wouldn't dare do it, and Lottie said she would and she did.

"Now you'd spose, auntie, that would make a girl madder than anything; but Lottie just told her how we all knew she was bright and generous and good-natured, and what a pity it was to spoil so many good things with one awful bad one. And that girl cried, and said where she used to go to school all the girls cheated, and she never thought about how mean it was, and she never would do it again, and she didn't. And she did a pretty brave thing I can tell you, for one day Miss Porter talked to her after school, and said she was sorry to see she was falling off a little in her history. And that girl just said right out that the reason was she had left off sheating and told Miss Porter all about it.

"So you see, Aunt Mary I found out the rest of my motto, that sometimes you ought to tell people what they don't like, but you can tell that kind of truth in love, too, if you really want to help people be better.

"I look at my motto every morning, and I shouldn't be a mite surprised if there were a good many more things about it that will come out by-and-by, like my Japanese box that you always keep finding something inside of." —Presbyterian Observer.

The Ice Palace at Montreal.

SAVE.

Children who have a little money ought to practice saving something. Many boys and girls of to-day hardly know a higher use for any money that comes into their hands, than spending it for some foolish thing as quickly as possible. To such, a lesson in self-denial and economy is very important. As go the boy's pennies and dimes, so, very likely, will go the man's dollars and hundreds by and by. Without having the spirit of a miser, the person accustomed to save, has more pleasure in laying up than a spendthrift ever knows.

The way to keep money is to earn it fairly and honestly. Money so obtained is pretty certain to abide with its possessor. But money that is inherited, or that in any way comes without a fair and just equivalent, is almost certain to go as it came. The young man who begins by saving a few dollars a month and thriftily increasing his store—every coin being a representative of good, solid work, honestly and manfully done, stands a better chance to spend the last half of his life in affluence and comfort, than he who, in his haste to become rich, obtains money by dashing speculations, or the devious means which abound in the foggy region lying between fair dealing and actual fraud. Among the wisest and most thrifty men of wealth, the current proverb is,—money goes as it comes. Let the young make a note of this, and see that their money comes fairly, that it may long abide with them.—Selected.

THE ICE PALACE AT MONTREAL.

On Monday the magnificent palace made entirely of ice was opened to the public at Montreal. It is a larger and more elaborate structure than the palace of last year, which thousands went from the States to see. Ice palaces are not a novelty in countries where the winter season is long and cold. Many years ago one was built in St. Petersburg, which was in its time one of the wonders of the world; but far smaller and less beautiful than the one pictured here. This palace is 160 feet long and 120 wide. The main tower is 100 feet high. The arched entrances in front and rear are flanked by towers 44 feet high. The whole is constructed of some 1,600 blocks of clear ice of uniform size. When lit up by electric lights of brilliant and changing hues. which are reflected from the gleaming walls, the scene both without and within is wonderful and grand. A writer in St. Nicholas for February, 1885, describes the magical scene last year:

"The first view of the palace on reaching the Square was enchanting. It was brilliantly illuminated with electric lights, which shone through its sides and gave it the appearance of a large structure of ground glass. A band of music was playing inside, and thousands of people in their warm furs and gaily colored head-dresses were crowding about it. A slight snow was falling, the air was cold but dry, and the whole scene made us think of pictures we had seen of winter sights in Moscow and St. Petersburg. Soon there was a cry of, 'Here they come,' and then at the northern end of the Square the torches of the snow-shoe clubs were seen approaching. On they came, and after several hundred had filed by, and their torches had surrounded three sides of the Square with a line of light, at a given signal a shower of rockets ascended from the middle of the Square. Roman candles were let off from the whole line of snow-shoers, and the ice palace was brightly lighted with colored fires, one tower being red, another green, and another blue. The effect was almost magical. We were well acquainted with Fourth of July fire-works (as what American boy is not?) but to see such effects in a snow-storm was novel indeed. We watched the whole parade—a thousand snow-shoers in their picturesque white suits, and then returned home, and from the window watched the line pass and repass across the top of the mountain and then wind down its side, doubling back and forth in the descent four or five times, until finally we saw it as it sank into 'the mellow shade,

Glitter like a swarm of fire-flies tangled in a silver braid.'"

TEMPERANCE.

THE INITIATION.

Not into a lodge of Freemasons. If we are rightly instructed we know that it is bad enough, but we now speak of the initiation into the rum shop, a lodge (not secret) numbering six millions of members in the United States, a lodge that holds its sessions daily and averages fifteen hours each session. Its Grand Worthy Chief is the devil.

Before we speak of the initiatory steps please take a look into the lodge room. McFarland draws the figure thus: "Health in ruin, hope blasted, affections crushed, home a desert; all the seats of parental care, brotherly love, and maternal devotion empty; in its most distant background there should be the vanishing vision of a blessed past, and in the foreground the terrible certainty of an accursed future. The scenes should be peopled with men whose shattered frames are tenanted by tormented souls; with starved, frightened children, upon whose lips no smile could ever play; with women into whose cheeks furrows have been burnt by hot tears wrung by anguish from their aching hearts. It should be illuminated not with the rays of the heavenly sun, but with something like the glare of the infernal fires. And still this horrible picture will fall far short of the truth."

But, notwithsthstanding this scene, there are many well meaning and professedly Christian men who see no danger in the feeders and rather advocate the use of a beverage which is found to be the greatest of all appetizers for rum and gin. We speak of beer. The reason many indirectly advocate its use is obvious, as we have learned in many ways since our last two articles on hop-growing. One editor whose subscription list is increased somewhat by the space devoted to the hop market, has taken us to task, and in one breath says he would like to make the paper a temperance organ, but it would not receive the proper support, and in the next proceeds to speak eloquently of "pure beer," etc. Another friend urges that "as hops in no way injure the quality of the beer," therefore, the business, as carried on, is perfectly legitimate. Another says that if men drank beer the traffic in rum would decrease.

This, perhaps too lengthy article, is not penned for the purpose of censure nor debate, but to correct, if possible, an erroneous view taken in regard to the use of beer. Our friends may be sincere but the facts will not bear them out in their oft-repeated statements.

The rum seller does not go out into the streets inviting young men to take of his soul-destroying beverage. Very few beginners could be induced to burn their throats with the stronger drinks. They must be educated to it by degrees. The vast traffic in alcohol has been chiefly built up by the brewers. Tens of thousands who never think of sipping brandy will drink beer for it is thought to be mild and comparatively harmless.

Every rum seller knows he is deceived. They know alcohol is in beer, and they put it in there purposely. They want young men to believe that beer is harmless, but they are particular to make it otherwise. With just enough of alcohol in it to create an appetite for something stronger they know when a man begins its use he is their victim. They have gone about this wicked business systematically and physiologically, and with beer gardens and beer saloons at every corner and even stretching out into the woods for the benefit of nearly every Sunday-school picnic, their work is complete. With beer in every billiard hall, skating-rink, dance-room, with beer in nearly every city grocery and in ten thousand country stores, offered as a premium to their customers, the rum sellers know that for every sixty thousand they kill annually there will be many more than that number of new recruits.

Statistics will show that the increased use of beer has a corresponding increase in the use of rum. Beer venders begin the work of desolation and rum sellers complete it.

We said rum sellers do not go about soliciting customers, but beer sellers do and are very successful. Having captured their bird they hand him over to the rum seller with a hellish smile that is full of meaning.

Fathers, mothers, beware of the man who offers your boy beer or tells him it is harmless. He is either ignorant or a well-paid emissary of the rum demon.—H. D. Clarke, in the Sabbath Recorder.

Count Bobrinskoy, one of the first nobles of Russia, was converted through the agency of his wife, and they are both zealously engaged in winning souls to the Lord Jesus. Russia is full of drunkenness, but, though the count has a hundred villages, and fifty thousand serfs on his estates, there is not a dram-shop on all his broad domain. Not long ago a dozen villagers came to him with a petition. When they were admitted to his presence he asked them what they wanted. They said they wished to have a dram-shop opened in their village, because they believed it would add to the happiness of the people to have a place of conviviality to which they could resort on holiday afternoons. This roused the lion in the count, and he gave them a ringing temperance lecture, finishing by threatening them that if they did not let the drink alone, and attend to their honest duties and pleasures, he would send them to work in the fields, at labor so heavy that when they had an hour for recreation and rest, they would find means of enjoyment themselves without the help of intoxicants.—Union Signal.

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

[NOTE.—On account of late mails Miss Flagg's comments on the Sabbath school lesson were received too late to print in their usual connection.—ED.]

1. Outward zeal for religion made a cloak for crime. vs. 27-30. Since these Jews recognize Trophimus as a townsman, they were in all likelihood from Ephesus—old and bitter enemies of the apostle. To inflame the passions of a Jewish mob by appealing to their fanaticism had always been an easy task. These men were filled with the same spirit that possessed the rabble which a generation before had howled through those very streets, "Crucify him! Crucify him!" There was the same scrupulousness about violating a jot of their ceremonial law; the same callous indifference to the most fearful crimes. They accuse Paul of polluting the temple, as they had once accused his Master of blasphemy against the holy place—he who in divine indignation had driven out the money-changers from its courts with the terrible charge, "Ye have made it a den of thieves." The same spirit may be seen in our own day. Many a church member possesses great zeal for the purity of Zion while tolerating in her midst the uncleanness of the secret lodge. They deprecate the evil influence of men like Ingersoll, while they excuse or openly defend Masonry and Odd-fellowsnip, though these orders have made a thousand fold more infidels than Ingersoll, Voltaire and Thomas Paine united. Furthermore they often persecute those who for conscience' sake oppose popular evils, with a malignancy that, allowing for a different race and age, is as unsparing and bitter as the hate felt by these Jews for St. Paul.

2. The Christian's lawful boasting. vs. 31-34. A Christian must be content though men class him with the offscouring of the earth, for the servant is not greater than his Lord. Paul is rescued from the howling mob who seek his life as a sacriligious renegade from the Jewish faith, only to be mistaken by the Roman tribune for the outlawed leader of a band of murderers. But he never forgets to assert his lawful rights, as the dignity and honor of his mission require. "I am a Jew of Tarsus, a citizen of no mean city," he tells the surprised tribune. "Suffer me to speak unto the people." So the Christian under the sneers and reproaches of the world may comfort himself with the thought that he is a citizen of no mean city; and more than that he is free-born. His is the glorious liberty of the children of God, and it is both his duty and privilege to put a true value upon it before the world. Any over-valuing of temporal good—of earthly ease, or honor, or pleasure, is an undervaluing of his heavenly inheritance. A prince in disguise is not disturbed by rudeness from those ignorant of his rank, so the Christain who "reads his title clear" will bear unmoved the scorn and rebuffs of men who have no understanding of himself, his work or his motive.

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

What was the character of Paul's assailants and accusers? Matt. 23: 13-33. What remarkable proof of their hypocrisy did they once show? John 18: 28. What rank does the Christian hold? Eph. 2: 19; Rev. 1: 6.

THE CHURCHES.

—After leaving Richmond, Va., where his tenday's meetings drew the largest audiences ever known in the city, Mr. Moody went to Washington, January 16th, and held a Christian convention in the first Congregational church, which was not long since opened to the Masons, for their "Lodge of Sorrow." The attendance filled the house to its utmost capacity. On Thursday last, Mr. Moody began a meeting in Harrisburg, Pa., to continue until Saturday. He will then probably visit Scranton.

—There are Lutheran churches in Minneapolis, which conduct services in six languages: English, German, Swedish, Norwegian, Finn, and Danish.

—One of the most successful churches of which we have seen recent record, is the congregation at the old country settlement of Providence, in Bureau county, Ill., several miles from the railway at Tiskilwa. This church was served for many years, until his death, by a faithful and godly minister who laid a good foundation, with a sound Gospel which did not omit to testify against the lodge. His successor, E. A. Paddock, has made a wise use of the Christian forces at his hand, with results almost wonderful in contrast with the average church work. A powerful revival, which brought in many of the heads of families doubled the membership in 1883, adding 41 to the number; and last year by the addition of 73 more it was nearly doubled again. Such glorious results might be attained in hundreds of churches were the same diligence and faith put in exercise.

—The Cremorne Mission of New York (the late Jerry McAuley's) makes an appeal for funds. The mission is now $1,000 in debt.

—The Rev. Geo. C. Needham, the evangelist, has been serving the Delaware Avenue church, Wilmington, Del., for three months as pastor. He will immediately engage again in evangelistic work.

—The Golden Rule of Boston, writing of Massachusetts, says: "An army of 12,000 teachers in this State can report but an average of 1,171 additions to the church per year, or one conversion to each ten teachers, or one out of eighty-one scholars! Are not such results 'appalling, disloyal, and most humiliating?'"

—Rev. J. Walter Lowrie, a Presbyterian missionary to China, has the only four-wheeled vehicle in Pekin—an ungraceful but useful covered depot wagon, built in Ohio. The natives are amazed at its wheels, so light and yet strong.

—Mrs. Hastings, an elder sister of Grover Cleveland, President elect, is with her husband actively engaged in the missionary work at Ceylon. Mr. and Mrs. Hastings have been on this field for more than thirty years. Six children have been born to them during this time, several of whom are grown up and are now laboring earnestly with their father and mother. Mr. Hastings is president of the Congregational college at Ceylon. An effort is being made whereby we hope ere long to give our readers a contribution directly from these veteran missionaries.

—We are astonished that so fair a Catholic paper as the Boston Pilot should give utterance to anything so shamefully false as the following: "'Civilized by English missionaries' means more than the words imply. It means that the 'natives' were found by England honest, simple, pure, sober, truthful, and probably warlike, and that the civilized influence of their conquerors has made them a race of drunkards, liars, prostitutes, and depraved serfs." It would be just as true to say that the Catholic church produces dynamiters and assassins, as well as "drunkards, liars, prostitutes, and depraved serfs."—Independent.

—The Christian Instructor gives the following touching item; "The eldest daughter of Rev. Dr. John Geddie, the well known missionary of Aniteum, left her parents in the mission field and went home to Nova Scotia for her education. She was absent for eight years. After she returned to the mission field her father wrote: "When we parted we did not expect to meet in Aniteum again, and we scarcely ventured to expect a meeting on this side of the grave; but God has been good to us beyond our expectations. But, alas! we were all so changed in appearance that our daughter knew not her parents, and we should never have recognized her. Such trials and experiences are not uncommon in the lives of missionaries. They are endured for Christ's sake, and those who undergo them for him shall not lose their reward."

—The members of the missionary colony which Bishop Taylor, of the Methodist Episcopal church, is establishing in Africa, sailed Thursday morning on the steamer City of Montreal. The colony numbers fifty-three persons in all, thirteen of whom are children. They took with them to-day 33,000 yards cotton cloth, which is used as currency among the inhabitants of the dark continent. Any amount of jewsharps, rifles, ammunition, axes, and tools of all kinds, a printing press, and 5,000 Bibles. The scenes about the vessel and pier that morning were animated, and at times pathetic.

DEDICATION IN MANSFIELD, OHIO.

A little more than seven years ago a mission station was organized in Mansfield, Ohio, under the care of the Home Mission Board of the Reformed Presbyterian church, there being only three ministers of the church; together with perhaps a dozen adherents. S. A. George, the present pastor, was appointed to labor for six months to test the practicability of the effort, and by the blessing of God he is still there, the pastor of a flourishing congregation, which was organized about eighteen months after the Mission station was taken under the care of the Board. The congregation now numbers 75 members, with a flourishing Sabbath-school, and a well-attended weekly prayer meeting. On the evening of Jan. 8th, 1885, they dedicated to the Lord a house of worship, the total cost of which was more than $13,000. It is a gem of beauty, and a marvel of cheapness, and, what is best of all, it was dedicated free of debt. Six hundred dollars were lacking on the evening of dedication, and it was all raised in a few minutes. It is a cause of great gratitude to this people and their many friends. May the blessing of God still continue with them.

A NEGLECTED PART OF WORSHIP.

The missionary magazines and many Christians in their private capacity have deplored the failure of the church members in consecrating their pocketbooks to the Lord. Argument and appeal do well with many individuals, and thousands have been led of the Spirit to lay all upon the altar. But the churches generally have a great lack in this matter. Few have tried the effect of making the offering a part of worship and training the children to a familiarity with giving as we do to Bible reading and prayer. The Presbyterian General Assembly, says the Foreign Missionary, has for years had before it the general adoption of systematic and proportionate giving by members of the church, giving year by year increased attention to the subject. At its last meeting the Presbytery of Cleveland, adopted the following overture to the General Assembly, which embodies some good and sound ideas on the subject which are worth the consideration of all Christians:

OF THE WORSHIP OF GOD BY OFFERINGS.

"I. In order that every member of the congregation may be habituated to give of his substance, systematically and as the Lord hath prospered him, to promote the preaching of the Gospel in all the world and to every creature, according to the command of the Lord Jesus Christ, it is proper and very desirable that an opportunity be given for offerings by the congregation in this behalf every Lord's day, and, in accordance both with the teachings and examples of Scripture, that the bringing of such offerings be performed as a solemn act of worship to Almighty God.

"II. The proper order, both as to the particular service of the day and the place in such service for receiving the offerings, may be left to the discretion of the minister and Session of the church; but that it may be a separate and specific act of worship, it is very desirable that the minister should either precede or immediately follow the same with a brief prayer, invoking the blessing of God upon it, and devoting the offerings to his service.

"III. The offerings received may be apportioned among the Boards of the church, and to other benevolent and Christian objects, under the supervision of the church Session, in such proportion and in such manner as may from time to time be determined by the congregation; but the specific designation by the giver of any offering to any given cause or causes shall always be respected, and the will of the donor carefully carried out.

"IV. It is the duty of every minister discreetly and judiciously to cultivate the grace of liberal giving in all his congregation, that every member thereof may offer according to his several ability, whether it be much or little."

THE CYNOSURE CONTRIBUTORS;

OR,

WHAT'S IN A NAME.

I see you have a noble list
Of Reverend's and D. D.'s;
For fear I might get in a mist
I herein send your Fees.

I hope you'll always think it Wright
To Post me on the lodge
And lay their secrets bare in spite
Of any artful dodge.

I pray the lodge may have a Paine
In every vital part;
O may it fall; ne'er rise again,
Pierced through its secret Hart.

I see our Flagg is now unfurled,
Our Cook will serve a feast,
The darkness flee from off the world—
The light breaks in the east.

I think we all can go on Foote
A thousand miles or so,
So that we could forever put Away their cable-tow.

Our Callender will guide us right,
Our Day grow brighter still,
Our Starry canopy will light
The lodge to all that will.

And may its Temple built of stone
Be rased unto the ground;
And may their great word, Ma-ha-bone,
Be lost, and never found.

I would that all may see the light
That comes from Christ above,
And leave their darkened lodge of night,
And serve our God with Love.

THE SECRET EMPIRE.

—The body of Major Charles B. Brady of St. Louis was incinerated lately in the crematorium at Lancaster, Pa., with Masonic honors.

—The Commander, Quartermaster, and a member of the Grand Army Post at Stoughton, Mass., were arrested Tuesday, charged with maintaining a lottery at a recent Grand Army fair.

—Prof. Clarence Martin, a Knight Templar Mason, and principal of a public school at Louisville, has disappeared, and is charged with losing $1,000 of teachers' salaries at faro. He is a member of DeMolay Commandery.

—The Boston Journal tells of the arrest of Alfred H. Oliver, a cashier of the Eastern railroad, for embezzlement. The young man was a prominent Odd-fellow and society man, and there is a strong effort to create public sympathy for him, though his guilt is clear and entirely without palliation.

The Sons of Industry, which has insurance as its principal object, issuing policies for $1,000 and $2,000, is now about twenty months old, having been founded in Detroit in May, 1883. There is at present one lodge in Detroit and a total of 37 in Michigan. and a few scattered over othea States. The total membership is about 1,900.

— The order of Knights of Pythias shows a wonderful increase in membership since its organization on Feb. 19, 1864. At that time ten persons conceived the idea of forming such an order, and on Dec. 31 of the same year they had added 68 to their number, distributed among four lodges, but the year following they dropped back to one lodge with a membership of 52. The increase was then gradual to 1874, when the entire membership was 101,453, after which it began to decrease until in 1878 it had settled down to 84,681, since which date the increase has been gradual until at present the membership is in the neighborhood of 150,000. The A. O. U. W. is probably the only other similar society that show a more rapid increase in membership than this.—Detroit Post.

—The Supreme Council of the Ancient Accepted Scottish rite of Freemasonry, at its annual meeting in Philadelphia, in 1879, adopted the following standing regulation:

"Resolved, That in compliance with the Statutes and Regulations of 1762, 'which requires every brother who attains the rank of Royal Arch, to sign a submission in due form,' to the chiefs of the Order of Masonry; and in conformity with ancient custom and requirement, and to meet the intent of the Constitutions of the Supreme Council; the secretary of each Subordinate Body shall keep a Book or Roster, which shall contain the Oath of Fealty and Allegiance to this Supreme Council, which shall be signed by each brother upon his receiving the highest degree in such Subordinate Body."

—The four lodges that formed the Grand Lodge of England were known by their places of meeting, and were held in London: 1. At the Goose and Gridiron Alehouse in St. Paul's churchyard. 2. At the Crown Alehouse in Parker's lane, near Drury lane. 3. At the Apple Tree tavern, in Charles street, Covent Garden. 4. At the Rummer and Grapes tavern in Channel Row, Westminster. The first meeting in connection with the formation of the Grand Lodge was held at No. 4, and the feast on St. John the Baptist's day in 1717 at No. 1, on which latter occasion Anthony Sayer, gentleman, was elected Grand Master. Only two of the original lodges (termed "time immemorial") are now in existence, namely, Lodge of Antiquity No. 2, and Royal Somerset House and Inverness, No. 4, originally Nos. 1 and 4 respectively.—The Freemason.

Guizot's CELEBRATED ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF France

REDUCED IN COST from $33.00 to $8.00, or comparing contents fairly, from $49.50 to $8.00, for the only other American edition of GUIZOT comes down TO The French Revolution, only, and is continued to Napoleon III. by MARTIN, and $49.50 is the published price of the two works. THIS ILLUSTRATED LIBRARY EDITION covers from the earliest times to 1848, is written by M. GUIZOT, Prime Minister of France, and completed from his notes by his daughter, Madame GUIZOT DE WITT. It is published in 8 volumes, small octavo, printed from the type shown by these lines, contains the 426 Illustrations, mostly full-page, of the imported edition, is bound in tasteful Library style, dark green cloth, beveled boards, gilt tops. Price of the set, only $8.00 by express, or, sent prepaid for $9.60.

"There is only ONE DRAWBACK. .·. it seems more like getting a present than making a purchase. Guizot is the most brilliant of French historians, as well as the most to be relied upon. He is the Macaulay of the history of France; his style and treatment are philosophical, didactic, rich in detail, dramatic in arrangement. His narrative is full of emotion, like a quick stream; his characters rise before us as in the flesh; they are men and women, not historic lay figures. It is as charming as any romance, and the interest is permanent. It is a work to keep and read and re-read for years."—Dominion Churchman, Toronto, Canada.

"In ENGLISH, at least, original or translated, we have NO WORK of French history that CAN APPROACH IT. We can name no work that gives the complete history, and gives it from the pen of a master, that can be thought of as a rival to the mammoth production of Guizot. How Mr. Alden can give the eight volumes, and this on good paper, and clear type, including the multitude of illustrations, is a thing we have CIPHERED over, but we fail to understand it. The first volume gives substantially the beginnings of French history. It is of necessity the dullest of the eight, yet with Guizot even logarithms would be readable."—Christian Leader, Boston, Mass.

"The MARVELOUS CHEAPNESS of these profusely illustrated and handsomely bound volumes must provoke comment everywhere. Each volume is easily worth $2.00, according to the standard of prices asked. This is the only complete American edition of this work, which is known as the best popular history of France."—Journal, Indianapolis, Ind.

"In the reproduction of this work the publisher has outdone all previous efforts, and has given us a MARVEL of EXCELLENCE, in every respect, at a marvel of cheapness."—Christian at Work, New York.

FARM WORK IN WINTER.

Though winter is a season of comparative leisure on the farm, it need not, and should not be a period of idleness. The necessary work to be done on every farm occupies a considerable portion of the short winter days, while the long evenings and some part of the remaining daylight may more profitably be devoted to reading, study, and planning the business of the ensuing year than in severe manual toil. The average farmer gets, in the course of the year, more muscular exertion than is for his best good. The mind will not act as freely when the body is wearied, and it is undoubtedly lack of good head-work that necessitates much of the severe toil of which most farmers complain.

So important do we regard time for thought, that we believe it would be money in the pockets of all farmers if they would take an hour or so every day, even during the busiest season, and that in the morning, when the mind is most active, for planning and thinking of what they shall do, and devising the best methods for doing it. They surely cannot afford to let their minds lie idle at a time when study, reading, and reflection are the most important duties which they can perform. Not that farmers should not work to some extent during every winter; for they can think and plan better while around the farm seeing for themselves what needs to be done. If they observe intelligently, they will find a great deal more to be done than they should think of attempting without help.

So, while the farmer himself should take time in winter for visiting other farmers, comparing notes and learning as much as he can about his business, he will also, because of this increased mental activity, discover enough work to keep at least one hired man busily employed during the winter, and on large farms two or more. This is, perhaps, as great a shock as we can well give to old-fashioned conservative ideas on this subject. We fancy we hear many farmers who have read thus far exclaiming in mingled surprise and disgust: "Would you have farmers in these times keep one or two hired men through the winter to do chores and get up fire wood for the following season?" Most certainly we would not. If no more than this is to be done, the farmer, unless he has other occupation, can well do it himself. He will need for health as much exercise as these traditional employments will give him.

Winter is a season when many things can be done more cheaply than at any other time of the year. Most farmers do not think so, because what little they hire is at day rates, which for short winter days are proportionately much dearer than day help is during the busy summer season. This is of necessity the case, that working men may make both ends meet during the winter. Most of them get a day's work so infrequently that they are obliged to charge $1 for it; and this is dearer than $1.50 in summer. But give these men steady employment and they can well afford to work for wages that will little more than assure them a living and the saving of their summer earnings. Many single men can be hired through the winter for their board and from five to eight dollars per month additional. And if a farmer finds an unusually active and handy man for winter help he can well afford to pay something more.

It is not good policy at any time to drive hard bargains with hired help in the matter of wages. This is especially true in winter, when more than ever depends upon the zeal and interest which help take in their work. The board is necessarily a large part of the wages that can be afforded in winter for work on a farm. But it is unfortunate that the phrase, "doing chores for their board" was ever invented. Doing chores is rarely, if ever, an equivalent for a home in winter; and unless a hired man is able and willing to do more than the chores, the sooner he is off the farm the better for his employer. On the other hand if the winter is an open one, and hired help is able to perform a greater amount and variety of farm operations they should be made to understand that they will be well repaid for all that they can do. This understanding that the laborer is sure to have whatever he can fairly earn is best for all parties. It is essential to securing good help on the farm at any season.

With a favorable season, if a farmer cannot devise means to keep one hired hand profitably employed through the winter, he is not fit for his business. Did you not miss last summer, perhaps in the busiest time, some conveniencies at your barns or gates that you have found at your neighbor's? You could not possibly do the needed work next summer, or at any other time when labor is hurrying you to the utmost. Such jobs must often be done in winter or not be accomplished at all. Whatever can be done at this season of comparative leisure to facilitate next summer's work, or to make next year's crop better, is clear gain. It is not an infrequent experience with those who understand this fact that the labor they employ during the winter pays better profits than that they hire at dearer wages during the busy season. In the summer they work at routine jobs, many of which must be done, though many of them do not pay. In the winter hired help do the extra outside jobs, which every farmer knows would be profitable, could he find time to do them, but which stand to-day as they stood ten years ago, without being done.

In an open winter low places may be underdrained, taking care to finish as rapidly as the ditch is dug. Fence rows may be cleared out that have been an eyesore for years, and the land brought under cultivation. Half-cleared places in the wood-lot, now practically worthless, may be brought into condition for cropping. This will be getting some new land free of tax; for taxes have had to be paid on it ever since you owned it, though it gave you no return. The stone and sand may be got ready and conveniently placed for putting a basement under your barns and other out-buildings. The supply of plaster that you will need next spring or summer can better be drawn on a sleigh than on wheels through the mud, or after the roads have settled, when the teams should be busy plowing, The winter-made manure may be drawn and spread on the field; and, finally, if there are days when nothing else can be done, occasional loads of manure may be bought in the city or neighboring village, and brought on the farm to maintain or increase its fertility.

One reason for keeping steady help through the winter is the necessity for keeping the farm teams employed through the year. Under our present system of cultivating extensively and mainly by horse labor, nearly all our farms are overstocked with horses. Nobody can afford to keep these animals idle half the year, and unless we aim at something more in winter than doing the chores, this will be the result. In fact, one-half of these same chores usually consist in feeding and growing these same horses, which often get so little exercise in winter that their shoulders are tender, their muscles flabby, and it takes several weeks of the busiest time in the year to make them fit for service. We cannot afford this; and for this reason, if no other, some kind of farm work should, if possible, be in progress every working day through the year. —American Cultivator.

"Unless we are greatly mistaken, the work will do more to awaken the American church and people to the evils of Freemasonry than any other book recently published."—Evangelical Repository.

The Facts Stated.

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt. William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribes his NAME to the letter, but ATTACHES HIS AFFIDAVIT to it.
In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six yeare with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of "secret societies."
The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

HOLDEN WITH CORDS,

OR THE POWER OF THE SECRET EMPIRE. A faithful representation in story of the evil influence of Freemasonry, by E. E. FLAGG, author of "Little People," "A Sunny Life," etc. This is a thrillingly interesting story, accurately true to life because mainly a narration of historical facts. 384 pages. In cloth, $1; per doz., $9. Paper, 50c; per doz., $4.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"There is no important history extant but has connected with it numerous other histories of which it was the initial point, or the dominating influence. The abduction and murder of Morgan set ten thousand secret springs in motion, as the surrender of the charters of so many lodges at that time, and the severing of their connection with the order of some forty thousand of its members indicated. This story is one of these histories, and is a collection of facts woven into a story. It cannot fail to be read with interest."—Free Methodist, Chicago.
"The republication of the Reform Story which run through the columns of the Cynosure for nearly a year is at last completed, and the book so anxiously expected by thousands of our readers has come from the press of Ezra A. Cook. The book is finely bound and fairly introduces the reader to the treasures within. The publisher has made occasional selections from Masonic works to verify the statements of the text; these make a helpful addition for some who can afford no more complete an armory of this kind."—Christian Cynosure.
"It is one of the most fascinating narratives we ever read and teaches its lesson in a manner not soon to be forgotten. It is evidently written for the heart and its words go to the heart. It is singularly free from wild denunciation. Those who are interested in the secret society question would do well to form the acquaintance of this interesting work."—Lutheran Standard, Columbus, O.
"The exciting scenes of the fall of 1826, at Batavia, N. Y., when Wm. Morgan was murdered by Masonry, are woven into the story so as to give the truth of History a setting of attractiveness. The forty chapters of the volume are soon compassed by the eager reader who begins the volume. This volume ought to be read and will be sought as its merits become known."—United Brethren in Christ.
"The story is intensely interesting and the author has succeeded in weaving into it a great deal of information in regard to this mysterious order, which is certainly startling if true, and he gives what seems to be undoubted evidence to prove his assertions. The book is one which should be read by both Masons and Antimasons."—Wayne Co. Herald.
"Our Anti-secret society friends are certainly entitled to great credit for their persistence in their efforts to expose and root out secretism. The object of the writer of this story is to present in its true light the crafty, unscrupulous and exceedingly hurtful influence of Masonry, the parent of all the orders."—Reformed Presbyterian and Covenanter.

LUCILE VERNON.

THIS is a pleasant surprise in many ways. The author is Rev. W. T. Meloy, of the United Presbyterian Church of Chicago, and the book is published by the Board of Publication of his denomination. It is a love story, not "fascinating," but with so much of genial interest that the reader is in no danger of laying it down unfinished. * * * The moral purpose of the book is to describe and vindicate Christian character, in its more heroic aspects, and it is a success. We congratulate the author and the United Presbyterian Board of Publication on this literary lily of the valley.—The Interior.

"LUCILLE VERNON" is evidently not an ideal sketch, but the fictitious names used represent to a great extent real men and women of flesh and blood. The characters of many of them are by no means attractive, but are perfect counterparts of querulous, obstinate and parsimonious professors who are thorns in the flesh of many a pastor in all the churches. But as in all the churches, there were also good and true men and women at Lansington, who upheld and encouraged the pastor. * * * In its author will be recognized the worthy pastor of the First United Presbyterian Church of Chicago, and a welcome contributor to these columns.—United Presbyterian.

IT belongs to the class known as the religious novel. It is a love story written in the Pansy style, and so constructed as to teach sound moral and religious principles, in connection with quite an interesting narrative. Indeed, when the writer sat down to examine it, he commenced as a critic on the sharp lookout for blunders, but soon he became absorbed in the story, and forgot altogether his critical duties. He also noticed that when the members of his family commenced to read it, they had but little time for anything else until it was completed. Tried as a work of art by the practical test, it must be regarded as a success. Its influence will doubtless be good in correcting false views, and in helping the reader to sounder principles and to a better spirit. * * * Some may think some of the scenes depicted are not true to nature, but the critic would be likely to find, on inquiry, that the very incidents which he would select as unnatural are actual facts. "We often find that truth is stranger than fiction."—D. A. W. in the Christian Instructor.

The heroine, who becomes the bride of the pastor of the church at Lansington, is a wonderful exemplification of how a woman who is a true wife and help-meet may throw her life and energies into the great work of saving souls; aiding, by gentle words and sympathy, wise counsel and brave endurance, the husband having charge of a congregation where the Demon of Misrule held full sway. We follow with interest the history of the wife and husband through their hours of despondency and discouragement to the happy ending, where religion, harmony and peace have gained the ascendency and the good man and wife find their reward.—Pittsburgh Daily Telegraph.

On Saturday Senator Edmunds introduced a bill in the Senate providing that the manufacture, sale or use of explosive compounds for the injury or destruction of property shall be punishable as a felony. Resolutions were adopted expressing indignation at the dynamite outrages in England.

COUNTRY.

The Kansas Legislature has declared against a national cattle trail through that State.

A bill for the extermination of English sparrows is being considered by the Michigan Legislature.

The historic liberty bell of Philadelphia began its journey to New Orleans on Friday morning, on a car specially constructed to bear it. A procession with two bands of music escorted the bell to the depot, and along the route some of the houses were decorated.

Hon. F. Ball, who was law partner of the late Salmon P. Chase, died Tuesday morning at Glendale, O., aged 76.

Angus M. Cannon, brother of George Q. Cannon, was arrested at Salt Lake City, last week for bigamy. Editor Penrose, of the Deseret News, organ of the Mormon church, was wanted on a similar charge but could not be found.

A State temperance convention was held, Thursday, at DesMoines, Ia., State Senator Clark of Page county, being chosen President. On a sheep ranche near San Angela, Tex., two Mexicans entered a tent where four men were sleeping and stabbed the entire party, killing one and mortally wounding the others.

FOREIGN.

It was officially reported, Wednesday, that serious fighting had occurred in Egypt. A battle occurred near Metemneh, an army of 10,000 rebels attacking the square in which the British forces were, advancing several time, but were compelled eventually to retire. They lost 800 killed and 800 wounded, while the English lost only 65. Among this number was Lieutenant Colonel Burnby, who made the famous "Ride to Khiva." No dispatches having been since received from Gen. Stewart, the British commander, it is feared he has after all been overpowered.

Three destructive dynamite explosions occurred in London, Saturday afternoon. At 2 o'clock, while London Tower was crowded with visitors, that portion of the building known as the White Tower was violently shaken, followed by the greatest confusion. The woodwork caught fire, but the flames were soon extinguished. Sixteen visitors were more or less injured, fortunately none fatally. Ten minutes later two explosions occurred about three minutes apart in the House of Commons and Westminster Hall adjoining. A lady called the attention of a policeman to a package lying on the steps outside the crypt of Westminster Hall. As he picked it up and started out, it exploded with terrific force, injuring him fatally and prostrating several by-standers. A great window over the entrance was demolished and the side windows blown out. Three minutes after the third explosion occurred, completely demolishing the lobby of the House of Commons. The western end is a total wreck and the glass roof shattered. The masonry, decorations and sculpture were utterly destroyed. A number of suspected parties were arrested, but as the police were unable to produce any evidence of their guilt they were discharged. All England is is a fever of excitement, and the speedy capture and punishment of the conspirators is demanded. The House was not in session, otherwise the result would have been frightfully fatal.

The Turin Gazette declares that England and Italy have signed a treaty that the latter shall occupy the territory from Massowah 300 miles south to Obok. England also agrees to support Italy's occupation of Tripoli, and will favor an Italian colony in West Africa. Italy, the paper says, is giving moral support to England's policy in Egypt.

Tremendous snow-slides have taken place throughout the whole Alpine region in the past fortnight, beginning with the partial destruction of the city of Klagenfurt in Austria, with the loss of many lives. Last week news from the western Alps told of daily disaster. A dispatch from Rome, Thursday, says:

"Many more villages in Italy were reported to-day devastated by avalanches, and the havoc is described as appalling. Most of the casualties seem to have occurred in the province of Cuneo, south of Piedmont, bounded by the Maratime Alps, many spurs of which intersect the province. At Frassino the number of killed is stated at 140, and 41 corpses have been recovered from the ice and snow. The village of Valgrava, on the Garna river, is partly destroyed and many persons are killed. Twelve houses were demolished and 42 persons killed at Deveis. The village of Rabasso is almost completely buried under the snow. Scores of people have been killed there and over 200 men, women and children are wounded, homeless and in awful distress. More than 3,000 men in the province of Cuneo are engaged, in addition to the soldiers, recovering the bodies and rescuring the living." Reports from different and remote villages, to the end of the week, repeat the news of awful disaster.

Earthquake shocks were felt again on Wednesday at Malaga, Loja, Vetez-Malaga, and Almunecar, in Spain, with some damage at the latter place.

Japan has voluntarily reduced the amount required of Corea as indemnity for the recent outrage upon Japanese subjects from $750,000 to $200,000.

BUSINESS.

Many do not wish the premiums offered them for getting up clubs for the Cynosure and have so written us. We cannot keep their names in mind and hence make a special request to all who desire any premium offered for canvassing for the Cynosure, to be sure to mention it, when due, in their correspondence with us, and state just what is their due. We will promptly attend to it.

Jas. W. Suidter sends in a club of ten, and J. M. Oxley one of nine, two of them for two months each.

J. F. Baird, Blue Springs, Mo., sends his "contribution to the cause" in the shape of money for the Cynosure which he donates to four of his neighbors for six months each.

Chester Williams, Waterport, N. Y., writes: "You may put me down for a life long subscriber. I endorse every plank in the American platform."

A practical kind of sympathy is shown by Rev. James Price, pastor 12th U. P. mission church, Philadelphia: "Please find enclosed $1.50 for my subscription till January, 1886. I thought seriously of discontinuing on account of taking so many denominational papers and not finding time to read them, but I sympathize with the cause and wish the Cynosure success."

A well-known worker in this reform, Philip Bacon, writes: "I regret that I cannot get some subscribers to your valuable paper, but the people seem to look upon it with fear." Would not a judicious distribution of the Thurlow Weed pamphlet be a valuable aid in preparing the people so that subscriptions might be obtained?

From North Carolina a lady writes: "I like the paper. I tell you your paper is a new light in this part of the world." Though the N. C. A. has no employed agent in the South this year, we are enabled by the gifts of friends to send the Cynosure into many new places, and we have evidence that in quite a number of instances it is doing very valuable work. Cannot those who have not yet sent in their donation to this object do so now?

Mrs. C. M. Snodgrass, of Dunlap, Kan., where Mr. S. E. Starry was mobbed, thus writes us: "I am talking up a club for the Cynosure and Statesman, and hope to have some success, but it takes time to accomplish this here. One year ago I would not have dared to say anything on this subject, but since our Masonic mob some have got their eyes open to the abominations of the lodge and want more light. The ball still rolls and I am endeavoring to keep it in motion."

An Oregon friend makes good use of his own Cynosure. "I gave a Baptist brother a few of the Cynosures and he tells me he was seriously contemplating joining the Odd-fellows, but now will not do so and is glad he found out before too late." Though working in his office twelve hours each day, this friend of reform finds time to get subscribers and friends for the Cynosure.

"A WEEKLY SHOWER OF REFRESHING."

Such is the language of a minister in writing of the

CHRISTIAN NATION

OF

New York.

—)o-o(—

Read some of the many high opinions of the CHRISTIAN NATION expressed by people and papers:

The True Radical Ring.

I like your paper. It has the true radical ring, and is growing better every week.
(REV.) T. C. SPROULL.

A Weekly Treat.

I have enjoyed a weekly treat, as the CHRISTIAN NATION is just to my taste. I like the fearless stand that it has taken for Prohibition. H. M. POLLOCK.

Par Excellence.

Allow me to congratulate you on the appearance and make-up of your paper. The matter is very good, and in fact the whole is par excellence. I hope you may receive many thousands of subscribers. S. O. LOWRY.

In the Front Rank.

I congratulate you most heartily upon the success which has thus far attended your enterprise, and wish you the largest measure of success in the future. This undoubtedly you will have, and simply because of the merits of your paper, which already holds its place among our best religious Journals, and has put itself abreast of the advanced movements in journalism. (REV.) J. F. CARSON.

Hold the Fort for Prohibition.

I am very much pleased with your paper. It is not a yearling, but I hope that it may be, like England's queen of old, hale and hearty at sixty—that it may live to see this nation a Christian Nation indeed and in truth. Hold the fort for Prohibition! Some of us have had to pass through the fire of persecution because we dared to vote our sentiments on that question, and your paper has been a weekly shower of refreshing to us. May it prove a blessing in this, and be a great power in the work of overturning the greatest evil that ever cursed our nation, and which does more than any other agent in hindering us from becoming a Christian Nation. (REV.) A. H. ORR.

Able Corps of Writers and Contributors.

Sacramento, Cal., Daily Record-Union.—A new paper entitled the CHRISTIAN NATION has been started at New York, under the conductorship of John W. Pritchard, and with an able corps of writers and contributors.

Pritchard....Thus ably manned the CHRISTIAN NATION is a worthy addition to the ranks of journalism, and deserves a noble support.

Fast Making its Way.

The National Republican, Washington, D. C.—Mr. Joseph Bowes, the leader of the Sabbath-school teachers' class at the Y. M. C. A. rooms, this city, is the writer of an article on the "International Sunday-school Lesson," which appears each week in the CHRISTIAN NATION, a journal published in New York. This journal is fast making its way into the hands of the Sunday-school teachers of the country on account of the superior and exceedingly helpful character of its articles on the Sunday-school lesson.

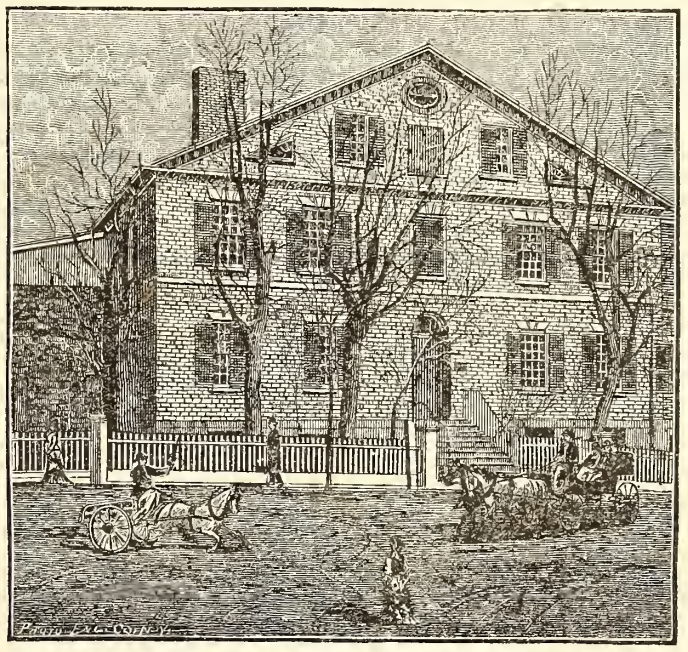
PROTEST.

Sign It, Men!

The first business when this paper is received is to turn to page 13, cut out the REMONSTRANCE and the reasons that precede it with the heading "SIGN FOR THE HONOR OF WASHINGTON." Paste the Remonstrance on a sheet of paper and get every possible signature without delay, taking the reasons along to be read by those who need urging. Return to this office, with the names of all who will sign—THIS WEEK if possible, so it can be forwarded to Washington early next week. The 22d of February, the day of dedication of the Washington Monument, comes soon.



Sign It, Women!

NOT A MOMENT IS TO BE LOST! The lodge, once refused, has begged its way into an undeserved place, and is to have its pagan rites performed. Let every Antimason, every American, every friend of Washington, protest against this outrage. A quick, strong blow can be given which shall reverberate in every lodge hall in in the land like the groans of Hiram. The lodge, by its arrogance, has invited just such an attack as we may give it by this protest. Years ago Freemasons laid the corner stone of the State House at Springfield, Ill. A protest went round and the stone came out. Again we protested against the Masonic ceremony at the Government building in Chicago in 1874, and the lodge trembled and the people came to the front. Again we must protest, so that the people shall be heard against subterfuge, sham and despotism. Let every subscriber get at least ten names—and get them QUICK.

Sign it, Every One Who Reveres the Father of His Country!

THE OLD CANANDAIGUA JAIL.

Among the historic prisons of the world the old jail at Canandaigua, New York, has already found a place; and will become of more importance as time passes and the pride and arrogance of the lodge increases, as its end draws manifestly on. Its place will be rather with the prison of Joseph, the dungeon of Jeremiah, and the dungeons of the inquisition, than with the historic Bastile or London Tower or the dungeons of the Doges of Venice. The Canandaigua jail owes its notoriety to the brief incarceration of William Morgan on a trumped up and petty charge made by Freemasons as part of a plan to get him within their power. How well their infamous plot succeeded is a familiar story to all the readers of the Cynosure.

Old Jail at Canandaigua.

Morgan was seized at Batavia on a false warrant, on Monday morning, Sept. 11, 1826, and driven in haste to Canandaigua, fifty miles away, where he was handed over to the custody of the jailer, late in the same evening. Twenty-four hours later, during the absence of that custodian, his wife was persuaded to release Morgon at the solicitation of several pretended friends, who paid, or offered to pay, the debt which formed the basis of the false charge.

Once out of the door Morgan was siezed, thrown into a closed carriage and driven by relays to Fort Niagara. This is the brief account of the awful tragedy that makes the old jail famous, so far as it concerns Canandaigna.

The jail was built in 1815, as appears from a tablet in the gable under the oval window, which reads.

This prison is erected for the county of Ontario, A. D. MDCCCXV., and of Independence the 39th.

The first sheriff elected by the county (though others were appointed for years before) was Phineas P. Bates, in November, 1822. The next election was in 1825; Joseph Garlinghouse was chosen and was re-elected in 1834. It was, therefore, during his first term that the Morgan kidnapping and murder took place. Our correspondent at Canandaigua, Mr. R. S. Woodward, was well acquainted with Garlinghouse in after years, and believes he belonged to the Freemasons. If so his absence from the jail Sept. 11, 1826, was no doubt a part of the preconcerted plan.

The roof of the old jail was burned off many years ago, but the appearance is about the same now as half a century ago. The cut which we have the pleasure of giving the Cynosure readers is regarded as an excellent one by citizens of Canandaigua who have seen it.

—The New Hampshire State Convention next week, Tuesday to Thursday, at Gilford Village promises to be a good and profitable meeting. Secretary Stoddard is this week at Reading, Massachusetts, attending the State meeting there from which we hope for a good report next week. Last week he visited several places in Connecticut and spoke.

VIS INERTIA.

BY H. H. HINMAN.

That property in matter that makes it incapable of motion until acted on by a propelling force, and equally incapable of ceasing to move until it meets an adequate resistance, belongs also to mental states and to popular movements.

When the Great Eastern was launched it took a large number of the most powerful machines to move the vast structure, and many of them broke down in the attempt. So, too, it took an immense moral pressure to awaken the popular mind to the danger and sin of slavery.

From 1830 to 1860 there was a most constant and untiring labor for this reform. With a devotedness as heroic as it was unselfish, men and women literally gave themselves to the work of popular instruction and admonition. Though they had on their side the revered Declaration of Independence, the Christian Scriptures and the moral sense of all mankind, they met a most unparalleled and desperate resistance. The whole power of the great political parties was thrown across their path. The great religious organizations interposed their enormous weight, and a popular apathy was turned into public hostility so marked and desperate that anti-slavery speakers were mobbed all over the North, and either murdered or driven out of the South.

It was only slowly and not without many providential interpositions that it became possible to organize a political party in opposition to the Slave Power, and it was only when such party had achieved a measure of success that the churches began to accord a little sympathy. Even then the great mass of the people were unprepared for emancipation, and it was only when the nation had been baptized in blood that we were willing to throw off the dreadful incubus that had so long weighed down both church and the state.

But when the great tide had turned, and the current began to set in the direction of human freedom, its progress was grand and irresistible. It suppressed the rebellion, emancipated the slave, secured the Constitutional amendments, reformed our financial and monetary systems, and made a beginning in a better treatment of the Indians. The religious bodies, too, as if to atone for past neglect, gave their sons and daughters to the not less brave and self-denying work of the education of the freedmen, and for this end they willingly poured their millions of treasure. No man has a right to say that we have not a national conscience and that it has not had a most grand and heroic development in the rescue of the negro from bondage and ignorance. Much doubtless remains to be done, and a change of administration does not imply a change in the convictions of the nation. The flood tide of Christian sentiment that has lifted up the oppressed races of our land has not spent its strength, but moves onward, and nothing can arrest it.

The movement for the suppression of the liquor traffic is running a similar course. So long as temperance was simply a sentiment, a question of private morals, it excited but little opposition. When it proposed to lay hands on the vast interests involved in the liquor traffic then the resistance becomes terrible and desperate. In vain have the friends of prohibition pointed out the fact that as a financial and economic question it eclipses all others. In vain have we proved that as a moral, social, educational and philanthropic question it equals or exceeds all else. The great political parties wholly ignore our facts and figures. They are utterly deaf to our entreaties, and throw the dead weight of their vis inertia across our path. Nay, even the churches and the ministry do largely now as they did forty years ago, reproach and vilify those who will not "go with the multitude to do evil." But the national conscience is not dead. It has at the worst but a partial and temporary paralysis. What the nation has done with slavery it will assuredly do to the liquor traffic. The feet of its supporters "shall slide in due time, and the day of their calamity makes haste."

Perhaps the most difficult of all reforms is that against the organized secret lodge system, that has spread its nets and scattered its poison in every town and village of our land. This iniquity takes on more than Protean forms and assumes a great multitude of disguises. It allies itself with about every department of business and almost every interest, both real and imaginary. It accumulates a vast capital, not only in great temples, but in insurance companies, in which the validity of every policy is dependent on the holders standing in the lodge. It has perverted the public conscience by confounding all distinction between unlawful and profane oaths and those taken in verity. It has invented ceremonies so absurd and so wicked that good people are unwilling to believe them possible. It has substituted a spurious brotherhood in place of the only one in Christ; and offered to the world a religious worship which proposes to fit men for heaven without repentance or faith in the Redeemer.

It is not wholly in vain that for the last sixteen years we have held up these facts to an indifferent and gain-saying people. It has not been wholly in vain that in true moral heroism the lodge has been laid open and bare, and its so-called mysteries scattered broadcast. Some have heeded, and we have a foothold and vantage ground that we can never lose. But, alas! our fate has not been different from our fathers. Men have not ceased to kill the prophets of to-day while they adorn the sepulchers of those who have gone before. Now, just as forty years ago in the anti-slavery cause, some grow weary and fall out of the ranks. Others are in sadness and doubt because the people have been "so slow of heart to believe," and all are pained above all things that the Christian ministry should be so unwilling to accept the truth that so vitally concerns the very life of the church.

Let us reflect that the momentum of moral, as well as physical, forces, will be in proportion to their weight, and the consequent difficulty of starting them. The Great Eastern, difficult as she was to launch, would doubtless ride down any other ship that should lie in her path; and this is true of all great reforms. God has said of his church, "No weapon that is formed against her shall prosper." God does not sleep, though sometimes to impatient men he seems to; "but as a dream when one awaketh, so, O Lord, when thou awakest thou shalt despise their image." Our great Captain is stronger and wiser than we. "He was manifested that he might destroy all the works of the devil." "He shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied." "He that spared not his own Son but freely gave him for our sakes, how shall he not with him freely give us all things."

GOOD TEMPLAR GRAND LODGERY.

BY REV. J. D. GEHRING.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—In my last letter I told your readers how the Good Templar lodge of Barton, Wis., unceremoniously thrust me out of their midst. I will now give them a glimpse of Grand Lodge justice and charity, by relating how I fared when I appealed to that body from the arbitrary and irregular action of Barton lodge.

As soon as I had confirmation of the rumor that the lodge had cast me out, and knowing that they had no cause for action to begin with, and had proceeded against me in an irregular manner, I proceeded at once with my preparation of an appeal to the Grand Lodge of the State. I prepared my paper with great care and gave a full statement of the facts and circumstances of the case. In addition to my own statement I secured, and sent away with the appeal, a testimonial by the "W. S.," or secretary of the lodge,—a man, by the way, whose moral worth outweighed the entire lodge in Barton. He, in his official capacity, testified, or certified, that the facts set forth in my appeal were correct and true.

The Grand Lodge met, that year, in Madison, Wisconsin. Of course I expected, as I had every right to expect, to hear from the "Grand Secretary" in regard to the action on my appeal, but not a word did I ever receive. I got the information, however, in a round-about way—brought home by the representative of Barton lodge, and the ring-leader in the plot against me—that the right worthy grand—swindle had rendered an adverse decision on my appeal. But I could not, even yet, believe that a Grand Lodge of Good Templars, composed largely of "Christians," and many among them "ministers of the Gospel," could act so unjustly. For the sake of self-respect, if nothing more (I thought) they will certainly be decent enough to notify me of their action.

Some time after this—if I mistake not, about six months after the meeting of the Grand Lodge—they had a sort of a Good Templar's convention in Barton, and "brothers" and "sisters" from other lodges attended. Among these visitors was a lady who had been a delegate to, and a member of, the Grand Lodge at Madison, and was on the committee which received and considered my appeal. Now it came to pass that this lady was entertained at the house of the friend who had given me his endorsement to the Grand Lodge, and who, as well as his amiable wife, took a deep interest in the history of my case. One day the conversation led to an inquiry, by my friend, what had become of that appeal; when she informed them that she herself was on the committee appointed to act on it. My friend inquired if the appeal was not well taken, etc., when she said: "Oh! yes, the appeal was all right; but, you know, we were bound to sustain the lodge."

Now, then, here we have the whole thing in a nutshell. A member of a lodge may take an appeal to the Grand Lodge, but the action of the local lodge must be sustained, you know, "right or wrong!"

The ear-marks of the Masonic beast are here plainly visible. The whole system is one great unmitigated falsehood—a grand moral sham. The foundation stone is a lie; the keystone is deception; the timbers are moral rottenness, and the whole structure was dedicated to despotism from the very beginning.

One year a sort of a Good Templar's show came to Barton and made an effort to give the order a "boom." Those in charge were titled "nobles" (?) of the order. They wore regalia of gay colors. They had a large tent in which to hold forth. They had J. B. Finch along to deliver orations. They held "open" meetings and secret sessions daily, and stayed over "Sunday." To make it as near as possible like a circus, without giving offense to "church people," they also had a lemonade-booth and peanut-stand, where they also supplied the busy temperance workers with cigars and their little ones with candy. The G. T. lodge of West Bend had charge of this department; and the most enthusiastic and persistent "temperance workers" were they, during those days. Like unto the usual saloons of the place, they made "Sunday" the most profitable business day of all.

I attended their afternoon meeting on the Sabbath and, to my surprise, I found this booth, situated near the main entrance to the tent, in full blast—two or three "Good" (?) Templars behind the counter, proclaiming the variety and excellence of their merchandise to those passing by to enter the tent, and several more inside the "Tabernacle" (!) peddling lemonade, etc., among the waiting audience. "Surely," thought I, "no Christian will encourage such an outrage by patronizing the traffic!" But they did—Methodists, Baptists and Presbyterians bought, and ate and drank, and laughed and talked, and enjoyed themselves generally.

When the time for opening the meeting had arrived, the "Grand Worthy" somebody—I do not now remember his name—who was at the head of the whole concern, came to me and requested me to come upon the platform and open the meeting with prayer. Pointing to one of the lemonade peddlers, I said: "If you will put a stop to this Sabbath desecration, I shall comply with your request; otherwise you will have to get some one else to do your praying for you."

His answer was: "I have nothing to do with that; the West Bend lodge has charge of that matter, and is responsible. But," said he, "I think they will stop selling as soon as we begin."

I replied, "Are you not in charge of this tent, and of the meetings? Could you not prevent the whole thing, if you had a mind to do so, to say nothing of the Sabbath traffic?"

Instead of answering my question, he said: "I haven't time to discuss the question: we must begin the meeting," and then went away.

During some of the opening exercises I saw the orator of the day, Mr. Finch, sitting to one side of the platform, but quite near it, engaged in whittling at a pine stick and talking to his neighbors, until the leader had to call him to order. When his time came he went to the platform and delivered his speech. Of course it was a good one. Meanwhile the lemonade was passed around, as before the meeting, and no one seemed to see the inconsistency. And yet these secret cliques pretend to be nearly, if not quite, equal to the church of Christ in purity and purpose. One member, at least, of Barton lodge claimed, in my hearing, that the lodge was doing more to save drunkards than the church had ever done.

The law of the State of Wisconsin requires that all places where liquors are usually sold shall be closed on election day, during the hours of voting. More correctly stated, I presume the law applies to those saloons only which are in the vicinity of voting polls. Now, the voting place of Barton precinct was, when we lived there, in a room adjoining a saloon, and that saloon did a rushing business on election days. The bar-room was always full from door to counter; and those who filled the room during the day were, of course, themselves full before night. More than once did I see beer served to the judges and clerks of election whilst on duty.

One day I mentioned this matter to the then "Worthy Chief" of Barton lodge, and urged the duty of the lodge to proceed against the abuse. But he said it was no use; that nothing would be gained but the ill will of "our neighbors". "And," said he, "for that matter, why doesn't your church do something about it? I think it is the duty of the church, before the lodge, to protest against such evils." (!) Now this man, who thus gave the church such a high place in special temperance work, was the same individual who had so boastingly claimed the superiority of the lodge over the church in reformatory temperance work.

Now it may seem to some that I am telling all this because I want to ventilate a personal grievance. To such let me say, nothing could be more disagreeable and unprofitable than to indulge such a motive. Had it ever been my disposition to retaliate in any manner, I should have done so during the heat of my first indignation. No! I am writing against the whole combination of secret and oath-bound societies. Good Templarism and "Temple of Honor"-ism are hatched by the same old Masonic grandmother hen, and, hence, I see no reason why I should skirmish around the brood, whilst I am after the old hen. I am just now thinking of the Satanic cunning and deceitfulness of Masonry in carrying on this sly, hypocritical hatching business. Just think of a temperance society styling itself "Temple of Honor," which excludes the very best portion of temperance workers—those who are properly entitled to wear aprons —and then puts aprons upon those who should be ashamed to wear them! Isn't that a training school for Masonry? And didn't the high Masons, who hatched out this strutting young hypocrite, know what they were doing for the "good of the fraternity," when they organized this white-aproned, anti-female, Temple of Honor?

Would it be advisable for an Anti-masonic prohibitionist to let his son go into such a "temple," and learn to wear a white apron—thus taking his first lesson in Masonry? The question answers itself.

PARONOMASIA.

In a Greek lexicon, under the word paronomaxo, I read this sentence from Strabo: "Attiken ten nun Attiken paronomastheisan." Play upon words has, I presume, been frequent among people of differing languages. We meet with instances in the Bible. Esau says, "He is rightly called Jacob, for he has Jacobed me two times." Abigail said of Nabal, "As his name so is he; his name is Nabal, and n' ballah is with him." In Judges 15, 16 we read, "And Samson said: Bilhi ha chamor chamor chamorathayim bilhi ha chamor," etc.

The Hebrew word sheba may mean an oath, or may mean seven. Rev. Septimus Jones, having passed through some degrees of Freemasonry, might select from the Bible this word as it occurs in different places with the one or the other signification, and, forming them into a sentence grammatically, produce something like the following: An oath, two oaths seven, sevenfold oaths, oaths seventy and seven, oaths false, oaths forbidden, etc. Was Samson's exclamation a boast? If he had reference only to his own strength, it was. He committed murder a thousand-fold with that moist jaw-bone.

Rev. Jones does the same in effect, for joining a fraternity of murderers and assuming their oaths he consents to all their oath-bound deeds. He stands judged with the clan. Bravo for the great patrons of Masonry in the Bible! Brother Solomon had seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines; and Brother Samson slew a thousand men with the jaw-bone of an ass! Father Adam donned the apron, and Eve was an Eastern Star! Any of these characters who committed crime, prominent as they are in Bible history, were saved (if saved they were,) through repentance, renunciation and reform. Freemasonry teaches a mode of salvation by living Masonically, a mode without Christ or repentance and, therefore, the mode of the robber and thief.

It has been said by some Bostonian that the privilege of being born there supersedes the necessity of the new birth. Such may be one of the tenets of Rev. Septimus, as this theology is about as good as the Masonic. I have a friendly neighbor by the name of Coffin, who is an Odd-fellow. I ask him to relate to me what he knows about the "Beckies" of his order. He replies, "I have abjured the lodge. My name is Coffin and, coffining, I have coffined the secrets, and must not uncoffin them to thee." Here is another instance of paronomasia. As the coffin and skeleton are important in a lodge of this order, when this man joined it, or was iuitiated into its dark rites, I presume he went a coffining as to spiritual life and light. QUAKER BOY.

IS GOD IN THE MASONIC OATH?

BY JOEL SWARTZ, D. D.

Will he who made the universe,
Who governs and sustains the whole,
Be party to the oath and curse
With which the Mason binds his soul?

Will he accept the horrid vows
Presumed and sworn in his great name,
Where nude, blindfolded Ignorance bows,
Senseless alike of guilt or shame?

Does he not hate the causeless oath,
With curse and imprecation crammed,
By which the soul and body both
Are bartered, mayhap, to be damned?

Ah, yes! When frantic priests of Baal
May get Jehovah to conspire
With them, his altars to assail,
And sanction their dark decds with fire,

Then may Masonic priests presume
To ask God's sanction to an oath,
By which their causeless curses doom
His altars and his honor both.

Shake off, ye oath-bound, shake with ire
The dark Masonic curse and band;
As Paul shook into flames of fire
The viper clinging to his hand!

Bound by your oath! When hell can bind
The soul of man in God's great name,
And hold it in its thrall confined,
Then may the lodges do the same.

Flee from your dens of darkness, flee!
Stand in the open light of day!
As freemen of the Lord, be free
And cast your hateful bands away!

WHAT THE MINOR ORDERS TEACH AND UPHOLD.

[From Rev. N. Wardner's paper before the Seventh-day Baptist Ministerial Conference, Albion, Wis., Nov. 28, 1884.]

In the new Odd-fellow's Manual of 1882, page 364, it says: "It is unjust to deem and term us anti Christian, because we admit men of all religions into the order, the same as is done by any business or geueral humane institution. Banks, insurance companies, railroad aud other associations admit all classes of religionists as members."

But why do Odd fellows claim that their Graud Patriarch (instead of Christ) leads and guides their members to heaveu, and furnishes them a pass-word for eternity? (Page 300.) Does this harmonize with Christianity? Banks, insurance and railroad companies make no such claim. Odd-fellows boast of their charitable deeds and liberality toward all religious beliefs. Yet, on page 368 we read that the order "to serve God as faith and conscience dictate, has formed and molded the prayers and other devotional forms of the order, so that all can unite in their utterances." What kind of liberality is that exercised towards a Christian, when prayers are dictated to him, in which the name of Christ must not be allowed to be mentioned, if a Jew or infidel happens to be present? What would be thought of the liberality of a Christian church which should thus dictate the prayers of all who should be permitted to enter the pulpit? Is it proper for a Christian to enter into a compact where his Lord is so carefully shut out?

But, says one, "What you say may all be true of Masons and Odd-fellows; but how are other secret orders—the Sons of Temperance, the grange, etc., in which most of the objections named do not apply, and they are doing much good?" No doubt they do good. The same may be said of Masons and Odd-fellows; but does that fact justify the wrong connected with them? It is doubtful if any confederation was ever formed which did not, in some way, accomplish some good. But Scripture—the Christian's law book—forbids doing evil that good might come. We are called unto righteousness, not unto a mixture of unrighteousness. Whatever may be said of the Sons of Temperance, the grange, etc., they seem to have the effect to shut the mouths of all their members against the evils of other secret societies; and also to prepare people to wink at said evils, and to easily slide into them. In this respect they have about the same tendency that temperate drinking has towards drunkenness. Christians should be children of light, and not of darkness; and should shun every appearance of evil, lest they become stumbling blocks to others.

A SUPREME COURT FOR THE WORLD.

Is the fond longing of philanthropists for a Supreme Court of nations to decide peaceably all questions that tend to war in process of fulfilment? If, instead of going to war on account of differences of opinions and interests, as has beeu the custom among all savages and half-civilized peoples, and even sometimes among the most highly civilized—if, iustead of this savage arbitrament all differences were decided by the arbitration of a council of nations, how much bloodshed, misery and waste, would be avoided. The great Powers of Europe seem to come pretty near to the ideal court of conciliation of the philanthropists; but the lesser powers should be admitted to a share in the good work in proportion to their population and power. This court of first aud last resort should likewise supervise the conduct of civilized nations toward inferior races as the great powers are now trying to do in Africa; aud it should decide all questions about straits and canals whieh connect oceans.—N. Y. Witness.

I BELIEVE IN PRINTER'S INK.

If I were asked to write out my creed, one article would be this "I believe in printer's ink." When a man puts in circulation a good, religious book, he sets in motion an influence the extent and duration of whieh he cannot estimate. It is a teacher that requires no outfit, no money for traveling expenses, no salary, is not affected by the climate, is never sick, and consequently has no druggist's or doctor's bills to pay, and by reason of age experiences no dimunition of physical or mental aetivity. Always ready for work; no blue Mondays; always as bright as the morning stars. Books can go and stay where it is not practicable for missionaries to live. Our merchaut ships carry books and leave them among the islands of the sea, as well as on the shores of coutinents, years in advance of the arrival of missionaries.

What agency for doing good in an inexpensive way will compare with the printed page? It is related of Rev. Dr. Goodell, of the American Board, that when in 1832 he was passing through Nicomedia, haviug uo time to stop, he left with a strauger a copy of "The Dairyman's Daughter" in the Armeuian-Turkish lauguage. Seventeen years afterwards he visited Nicomedia, and found a church of more than forty members, and a Protestant community of more than two hundred persons. That tract, with God,s blessing, did the work. Good seed—"some sixty and some an hundred."—Dr. Stockbridge.

My travels bring me into intimate relations with a large number of preachers. Wherever I find a man holding three speeific doctrines I expect a revival through his labors. What are these doctrines? The necessity of immediate repentance, the atonement as held by the evangelical churches, the supreme religious authority of God's Word. Wherever I find a man in whom these doctrincs are not a creed, but a life, I usually find a revival goiug ou in a slow or a swift way. I solemuly believe that it is the divine will that we should teach the necessity of the new birth in this life, the necessity of the atonement in its biblical form, and the authority of God's Word in precisely the terms and tone in which the Bible teaehes these truths. Wherever I find a man doubtful on either of these highest matters I usually find a torpid church, or one that may, perhaps, be drifting iuto disintegration, or into some foppish liberalism adapted to the wants of an easy-going age. Sueh an organization may be called a church, indeed, but it is really little more than a club-house.—Joseph Cook.

OR

BY E. E. FLAGG, AUTHOR OF "HOLDEN WITH CORDS."

CHAPTER VIII.—Concluded.

One who has taken a deadly dose of laudnum may seem to be only in a sound, natural slumber, while every moment is locking him faster in the sleep that knows no waking. This was the trouble with Stephen. That old-fashioned couple in their hill country home who held to the old theological landmarks with a pertinacity quite in keeping with the rocky, stubborn soil from which they drew their livelihood; who believed in the inspiration of the Bible from Genesis to Revelation; who held that the deepest conviction of sin could not fathom the awfulness of that guilt which cost the Son of God his life; who looked upon time as the only preparation for eternity, and on all departed souls gone into the invisible as beyond the power of any prayer or ceremonial rite whatever to alter their final state, could not understand, what Stephen had never told them, that he had been spiritually chloroformed by the false worship of the lodge, which fascinated him with its dreamy, shadowy semblance of the true religion, as the mirage with its vision of palm-fringed lakes fascinates the desert traveller.

Not that he was wholly satisfied, for it sometimes crossed his mind that he did not fancy standing in fraternal relations to men of such free and easy morals, as VanGilder, for instauce; and he even had strong suspicions that many of the members secretly adjourned after lodge meeting was over to some of those very bar-rooms upon which he, as attorney for the Law and Order League, had beeu waging such vigorous warfare. Iudeed, he once hinted as much to Mr. Basset, who answered him with a reassuring Scriptural quotation.

"Wheat and tares, wheat and tares. They've got to grow together iu the lodge as well as in the church. As to VanGilder, I don't stand up for the man; you know I don't; but still he's no worse than a good many others, and if we went to expelling all the uuworthy members I don't know where we should stop. We all have sins and shortcomings enough to lead us to deal charitably with weak aud erring brethreu."

Stephen felt rebuked, as if Mr. Basset had delicately accused him of Pharisaism, not reflecting that such a man as VanGilder might easily be iu possession of too many secrets (which was in fact the case) affecting the reputatiou of seemingly respectable members of the fraternity to be safely expelled. And as to the vexatious and ueedless drawbacks which he had met with in proseeutiug liquor sellers —it is true that Stephen himself had solemnly promised "to warn a brother of any approaching danger, whether from his own imprudence or the evil designs of others;" but he would have repelled with scorn and indignation the idea that this could ever mean shielding a criminal from the consequences of his crime, and he was far too honest and fair-minded to impute any such understandiug of it to others.

From all this the reader will see that Stephen Howland was very thoroughly humbugged, and would have afforded a fine illustration for Mr. Treworthy with which to point his arguments and facts when discoursing to Nelson.

CHAPTER IX.

A NEW KIND OF MACHINE.

Chronologically speaking, this chapter is out of place, for it belongs to au early epoch in our story, when Stephen Howland was paticutly waiting for slow-footed Fortune in the shape of his first client, Nelson Newhall.

Fairfield is one of the pleasantest of prairie villages, and the finest farm therein is owned by Israel Deming, himself as fine a specimen of the well-to-do Western farmer as oue often meets. At the present moment he sits on his shaded back porch discussing the uews and the crops with Uncle Zeb, and at the same time enjoying the cool breeze that has sprung up after a day of unusual sultriness. Uncle Zeb is a lean, dried-up little man who might have sat for a picture of Timon after the goddess turued him into a grasshopper, so much did his long, thin legs, and a certain lively quirk in his voice, to say nothing of a happy faculty of living without work or worry, remind one of that musical insect.

"They say corn is going to yield more to the acre than it did last year, Mr. Deming," remarked Uncle Zeb, briskly. "Them frosts we had along back didn't do no great damage arter all. I see your wheat is eoming ont heavier than the average. Some folks think it is all luck, but I believe what Solomon says, 'The hand of the diligent maketh rich.' And I tell 'em if they'll only pattern after Israel Deming, always up and at it, early or late, rain or shine, they'll have as good luek as he."

"Anyhow I don't get much more than my living," replied the person thus eomplimented; "and no farmer ean with these high freights and middle men taking all the profits. These confounded corporations lobby round, and wheedle and bribe Congress into voting away the people's land and money to make the rieh richer and the poor poorer. Farmers onght to combine like other working men to protect their own interests, I say."

Now the wrongs of the farmers was a theme on whieh Mr. Deming always waxed into a fiery indignation, and if some of his strong speeches on this snbjeet could have been uttered in the ears of the Senatorial "dough-heads" (his mildest term of eontempt for law-makers who truckle to class interests) it might have made their ears tingle, but would certainly have done them no harm.

"They says there's going to be a farmer's grange started in Fairfield afore long," responded Unele Zeb.

Mr. Deming broke off a head of orehard grass that peeped through the lattice, and ehewed one end of it refleetively.

"To tell the truth I ain't certain about these granges. No offenee to you, Uncle Zeb, but I want nothing to do with anything that is patterned after Masonry, and I have always been suspicious that the grange was a kind of Masonic institution. But then I don't know anything about it."

"I ain't one to give offence, Mr. Deming—leastways not when I know it—and I never take what I ain't ready to give," was Uncle Zeb's reassuring reply. "I'm a Mason, bnt not one of your thinskinned kind. There's bad and there's good in Masonry, and I see no sense in aeting as though the thing was a powder mill, and if anybody said a word it would blow up. But I'll tell ye how I look on this 'ere matter of the grange. It's jest a new kind of maehine. Farmers mnst test it and take their ehances. It may break down arter usin' of it awhile and eost more for repairs than its wuth. And it may be hard to get the hang on't. Some machines are awkward things if a green hand tries to run 'em without knowing how; get eaught in 'em and they'll pound a man to jelly or eut him up into inch pieees. And then agin, —"

How far Uncle Zeb's lively imagination would have earried him in pietnring all the possibilities of "the machine" must forever remain among the things untold, for he was interrupted at this junctnre by a pretty, girlish fignre suddenly framed in the doorway, while a voice, sauey and sweet as a bobolink's, cried out,—

"Now, Unele Zeb, what do you mean, saying sueh awful things? Father will be more prejudiced against the grange than ever, and I was hoping they would start one in Fairfield right away."

"I only ealled it a machine," said Unele Zeb, composedly. "I had to make some sort of a comparison, and they use maehines for everything under the sun, nowadays, so that seemed to come handiest. I never said whether it was bad or good."

The nymph in the doorway tossed her bright head. She and Uncle Zeb were nsed to bandying words with each other, and both enjoyed the exercise.

"Well, I think it is good. I don't like Masonry, bnt I like these soeieties that women and girls ean join as well as men and have a nice time. And they do have splendid times in the grange. Mrs. Thompson told me all about it."

"Marthy Washington," ejaculated Unele Zeb, who had an odd habit of using the name of that distinguished lady when he felt the need of a mild expletive. "They say women never can keep seerets, and now I shall believe it sure enough."

"Oh, nonsense, Uncle Zeb. You know I didn't mean that Mrs. Thompson told me anything she hadn't a right to. She says the grange is really nothing bnt a farmer's clnb, only the seereey makes more fun. You will join, won't you, father?"

"I don't know, Dora. I shall have to think it over first. Of eourse its natural for young folks to like a frolie, but a society that's all play ain't going to benefit the farmers mueh."

"I don't fancy the idea anyhow," put in Mrs. Deming, very decidedly, from her seat by the open window. "I remember how it was with the Good Templars. When a lodge was started here I let Dora join beeause I thought it a good thing for young people to get interested in temperanee work. But the way they earried on! The last time Dora went they had a dance, and she didn't get home till after midnight. I never let her go again, and so many of the other parents in Fairfield thought as I did that the lodge died down in less than a year withont reforming a single drunkard. so far as I could find out."

"I ean see into that easy enough," said Uncle Zeb. "I've known plenty of drinking men that jined the Good Templars, and thought they'd reformed as much as eould be, but when they had gone through it all there wa'n't anything more behind to hold 'em; and so they'd go baek to their cnps, and their 'latter end would be wuss than their beginning,' as Seripter says."

"That just goes to prove what I've said all along. If you want to reform a drunkard better try and hitch him on where there is a power strong enough to hold him up. I never knew a reformed man to join the church and give good evidence of eonversion and then go back on his pledge. It is in reform as it is in everything else. If we want to aeeomplish anything worth speaking of we must buckle down to real, right-down, honest work; turning work into play won't answer."

"That's so," assented Unele Zeb, with an energy of speech not at all abated by the faet that he cherished a mortal hatred to work of all kinds.

"Well," said Mr. Deming, "I'm a good deal of my wife's way of thinking about the Good Templars. But the grange don't pretend to have any moral aim, I take it; and just as a mutual benefit and improvement soeiety for the farmers, I don't see as there would be any harm in starting one and seeing how the thing worked."

"And just remember, Mr. Deming, that when a man invests his money in a machine that don't work he's so much out of poeket."

Which was touehing her husband on a weak point—a smooth-tongued agent having onee beguiled him into doing that very thing, buying a new kind of patent reaper whieh proved worthless when it came to the test.

Unele Zeb gave a mild ehuckle of inward amusement.

"I guess yon're about in the right on't, Mrs. Deming. Well, I must be a going. Looks as though we might have a dry spell. I see the moon turns up eonsiderable."

And Uncle Zeb shambled off to finish his evening round of gossip somewhere else, while Mrs. Deming ealled to Dora to eome in and pick over a pan of beans for the next day's dinner.

Dora obeyed, thinking meanwhile just sneh thoughts as come naturally into a young and foolish girl's head. She was pretty and she knew it. She was fond of admiration and a good time, and all the reason why she wanted to see a grange started in Fairfield was because its meetings promised to supply her with both those desirable things.

Mrs. Deming's rule over Dora (who, as the reader has probably guessed, is no other than Nelson Newhall's sister) had been vigorous enough; but it was the vigor of real, maternal affeetion to whieh we can forgive an occasional hardness supposed to be for the good of the subjeet. Dora was Mr. Deming's pet; he never crossed her in anything, and she would certainly have been in a fair way to be spoiled if her adopted mother's sound common sense had not come to the front.

Under this combination of influences Dora Deming had grown up a bright, merry, thoughtless creature, loving her foster parents dearly, popular among the young people of her own age, with a general desire to do right; and sometimes, under an especially moving sermon, or when there was a period of religious awakening, feeling a vague longing after something higher and nobler than her life had yet developed. In short, her's was a nature of that very eommon and mortal type from which most of the happy wives and mothers about us are made. But as she stands in the Paradise of her maiden innoeence we have grave fears for Dora—unbalanced, undisciplined, ignorant of her own heart, when the serpent whose trail is over every earthly Eden whispers in her ear his subtle temptation, will she be wiser, stronger to withstand him than was the first Eve? God grant it.

Mrs. Israel Deming has spoken for herself. She was a good woman, active and stirring, who plaeed laziness in the same category with dirt and flies as a thing to be held in utter abomination; but at the same time she tolerated Uncle Zeb with a goodnatured, half-eontemptuous toleranee much as she would a monkey or a parrot. The fact is, everybody has a tender side for the village gossip or the village joker, and Uncle Zeb, in a small way, practiced both vocations.

Mr. Israel Deming was, like his wife, a staunch church member, a law-abiding, law-upholding American eitizen, who wanted to [illegible] everything of a rascally nature put down—so effectually that it would stay put down, whether it was polygamy in Utah or a whisky ring at Washington. He was also an Anti mason, though not very thoroughly instructed. He had a plain, honest man's dislike to fuss and feathers as savoring of monarehial rather than republiean institutions. But the idea of the grange fell in with his weak side. He was told that it was a society intended to unite American farmers in one grand combination against the gigantie monopolies that were driving them to the wall.

Now there were some things Mr. Deming understood as well as the average Congressman. He knew that our patent laws, which could be so grossly prostituted as to tax, in the interests of great moneyed eorporations, everything used in working his farm down to the very material with whieh he built his fenees, needed a thorough overhauling. He knew that gamblers in grain were allowed to depress or inflate the markets at their own will to the injury of consumers and produeers alike; and railroad magnates to filch their heavy dividends on watered stock direct from the poekets of the long-suffering farmers; while Congress, whieh had not passed a single bill of any importance in aid of the agricultnral elass since the Homestead Aet, was squandering millions in land grants to eorporations of its own ereating, and closing up vast sections of the publie domains to the poor and honest settler. Naturally enough, he thought, it was time that government should be made to see that it was killing the goose whieh laid the golden egg. But what spirit of madness and folly eould lead honest, intelligent Israel Deming, and thousands of others like him, to imagine that monopoly eould overthrow monopoly, that ring rule eould banish ring rule, and the devil of organized selfishness cast out the devil of political bribery and eorruption?

Mr. Deming disliked secrecy, and all dark-lantern ways in general, but to sueh infinitesimal doses as the grange offered him, eoupled as it was with a vague promise of unknown good, he felt no great objection. The invisible empire, the dim, shadowy image of the beast ehanges its form to suit every eurrent of popular feeling, as a fisher throws his net in all waters? It is a monarchist with kings, an aristoerat with nobles, a demoerat with the working man. But after all these fish had been caught, there remained one more class to gull—the eonfiding, simple-hearted tiller of the soil. And in spite of Uncle Zeb's oraeular warnings and his wife's plainly-expressed antipathy to the whole thing, Mr. Deming concluded to try "the maehine," with a result whieh we will leave for future ehapters.

NEW HAMPSHIRE PROHIBITION STATE CONVENTION.

A New Hampshire Prohibition State Convention was held at Monchester City Hall, Jan. 27, and well attended. A permanent State organization was formed for politieal work, looking to the enforcement of the laws against the liquor traffic. Speeches were made by Hon. L. D. Mason, Hon. John H. Goodale, Hon. John B. Fineh, of Nebraska, the writer, Rev. Dr. Miner of Boston, and Rev. Dr. Wallace of Manchester. The addresses were excellent, espeeially those of Dr. Miner and Mr. Finch. The latter gentleman, however, marred his noble effort by two faults. He ruthlessly murdered the "King's English" and seemed to be proud of it, and with strange forgetfulness of his zeal against the lawless grogshop, he deliberately advocated applying mob law to freelove advocates.

In the eourse of my remarks, I emphatieally diseountenanced the bungling methods of the seeret temperance orders, and declared that by nearly half of the temperanee people of New Hampshire the evils of the secret lodge system were considered only second to those of the grog-shop; that our work to suceeed must be Christian and open. My remarks were reeeived not only with courtesy but by applanse. The tone of the meeting was resolute and Christian. The leading idea seemed to be that our temperance laws will never be enforced until we by political action compel our [illegible] servants to do their duty.

LEBBEUS ARMSTRONG.

AN INTERESTING HISTORICAL LETTER.

LIMA, Ind., Jan. 29th, 1885.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—In your to-day's issue, you ask if any one of your readers can inform you "if Rev. Lebbeus Armstrong, * * preached once in Moreau, Saratoga Co., N. Y., and at what time."

From a record now in my possession, I send you the following:

"Mr. Armstrong * * having become a clergyman, was, on the 15th day of March, 1804, installed as pastor of the Congregational church in Northumberland, a part of which, containing its meeting house, is in the town of Moreau. There, as the Rev. gentleman expresses himself, he became (through the influence of his family physician) a pioneer subscriber to the pledge of the first organized temperance society—the parent temperance society—ever known to exist in our land or world."

This society was organized in the hotel of P. S. Mawney, in Moreau, on the 20th of April, 1808. How long Mr. Armstrong remained pastor of this church I cannot now tell. He lived to a good old age, and died some twenty or more years ago, in Saratoga county, where he spent his later years. I knew him personally many years before his death.

The famous temperance society alluded to was named "The Moreau and Northumberland Temperate Society." Quite a curiosity in these days would be its by-laws. If you or your readers would like to know more of them, I can gratify them. Fraternally yours. J. L. BARLOW.

DANGEROUSLY WOUNDED!

Nothing but my sense of duty to the millions of my fellows whom I love, and whose welfare I am bound to seek, could induce me to even allude to a fact so unwelcome to my heart as the one above indicated. Perhaps no man in this nation save Washington and Lincoln, has received more honors and wielded more influence on the American people than the soldier President, whom God in his providence designated to lead us out of the "Great Rebellion."

Our hero of Vicksburg, and the "Wilderness" conflicts, having escaped a thousand perils, probably falls by tobacco. Sad, very sad indeed. The instinctive prayer of a million souls is, O Lord heal the wound inflicted by man's deadliest foe,—excepting possibly, "Prince Alcohol." But for the vast influence exerted by our "Smoking General," on the tens of thousands of our noble young men, the pen should never move in my hand that would allude to a fact that afflicts my very heart.

How many thousands have been influenced by the example of this great man, deservedly popular, will never be known till "the books are opened" in the final judgment. A nation of smokers, is as near the fact as is the other sentence "a nation of drunkards." Who can say that the victims of tobacco are not as many as the victims of alcohol? If the drinks do the work more effectually, with those who take them, it must be remembered that there are four who use tobacco in one form or another, to one habitual drinker; and that those who use the latter at all, are habitual smokers and chewers. Those who get "wounds without cause" in this conflict, generally get fatal ones at a vital point, and that, too, by their own hands. Oh! the tobacco customs of to-day, in this country, are enough to make angels weep, as they look down on the scene.

"God is no respecter of persons." He who violates physical law, be he general, president or monarch, must reap as he sows. Divine law is never broken—only disobeyed, violated—and recoils on the transgressor, and finally breaks him. Our hero, when restricted to three cigars a day instead of thirty, by his physicians, quit the whole, just like himself. Though he die in the struggle, he will fight it out this line, if it takes all the residue of his days.

How many of the thousands who may have been influenced by the smoking habit of our American hero, will now follow his example in abandoning the pernicious and cancerous habit of using the stinking weed? Hundreds of times in the past twenty-five years have we sadly thought of the vast influence of this smoking propensity which the press, without intimating that the habit is pernicious and ruinous, took pains to publish in a thousand spicy forms. But we did not then know the sequel, and could only conjecture the probable result. May the General see many happy days, by giving up fleshly gratifications and by evangelical repentance and faith in the Son of God be healed in soul and body, is the humble prayer of your correspondent. TOWARD SUN-DOWN.

LABAN, KANS.

We read that Lot pitched his tent from time to time toward Sodom, until he finally reached the goal at which he was aiming. We have also been pitching our tent, if not towards Sodom, at least toward sun-down, and now somewhat nearer the Rockies than we have ever been before. The "little mother," as our big boys call her, and myself, are keeping house "solitary and alone," trying to make ourselves believe that history was repeating itself, and that we, having been caught by the whirligig of time are thrown back to those memorable days when orange-blossoms were the crown of glory rather than the silver tresses which adorn the brow of the beloved to-day. But it is all a delusion. Memory and hope, hand in hand, step to one side as stern reality comes to the front, claiming the hour as its own, and we cease to speculate on the causes why the former days were better than these.

The house in which we have taken up our abode, is situated eight miles south of Beloit, high and dry, on the divide between two creeks. Consequently we have a great plenty of wholesome air, breezy and fresh, notwithstanding "the Salt" which is only a few miles south of us.

The meeting house of the Wesleyan Methodist church, to which I minister, is just across the road from our domicile, and is a neat, though plain building, which gives some unmistakable signs of what a Kansas zephyr can do in the way of cracking plaster. It was purposed to repair this damage in the fall, but the on-coming winter suggested a delay until spring, when the building will be put in a condition the better "to stand the storm," Mayhap the storm of life has been a little too severe with some of the members of the church, making repairs necessary in other places than on cracked and broken walls. If so, let us remember that now is the time to do that kind of work.

The country around here is new; and everything, farms and all, has the appearance of lying out of doors, and we cannot avoid the feeling that the good people would do well to take their houses in at night. The cattle are fenced in, herded or kept within proper bounds by long ropes, known here as lariats. In not a few instances the minus rather than the plus is the predominating element in the things that do appear. But notwithstanding all these disadvantages, which are incidental to the opening of new farms the country over, Mitchell county has not a few advantages over more populous sections of the State, and it is only a question of time when this portion of our fair domain will not be content to occupy a back seat on 'Change. In the good time coming, and the shadow thereof is even now thrown athwart the plain, the so-called American Desert will blossom as the rose and vie for the supremacy with the garners of the world.

Shortly after coming here I made the acquaintance of an elderly gentleman by the name of Cutler, who resides near the confluence of the Laban with the Solomon, a stream as crooked as the paths which the "Grand Master" made after he had married his thousand wives. In those days which tried men's souls Father Cutler remained true to God, and therefore he responded to the pleas of down-trodden and oppressed humanity, while not a few others gathered up their skirts and passed by on the the other side, permitting their brother to lie unaided in his blood until such time as a good Samaritan might pass that way and render the needed help. We had a long and pleasant talk about by-gone days, wherein underground railroads, stations, conductors, and hair-breadth escapes came in for their full share of time and attention. And when we talked about J. Blanchard, Z. Eastman, I. Codding, Chas. Cutler, Dea. Berge, Owen Lovejoy, and others with whom we were personally acquainted, our souls knit together, and we felt as though we were near of kin. I need not add that the old reformer remains true to the right, and that he voted for St. John, writing the word "American" on his ticket. His grandsons, the Case brothers, are also on the war-path, having enlisted for life, and are doing what they can in the prohibition ranks to bring to a speedy end the terrible state of things which the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage has inaugurated.

Speaking of voting for St. John reminds me of what was told me, not many days since, by one of the parties concerned. A man who yet felt sore over the defeat of the Republican party, censured Bro. Stalker for voting for St. John, and thereby helping, as he said, to defeat Blaine. Whereupon Bro. S. replied that he had heretofore voted the Democratic ticket, and would have done so again if the choice had been confined to Blaine and Cleveland. After receiving this piece of information, our Republican friend had nothing more to say about the moral depravity of those who voted the Prohibition ticket. We offer Bro. Stalker our congratulations for belonging to a class of men who can acknowledge that they voted for St. John without calling down on their devoted heads the anathemas of those who have been loud in their demands for a free vote and a fair count, provided their man was not counted out. B. F. WORRELL.

THE EXCITEMENT IN ALBION, IOWA.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Ten years ago every officer in the corporation of Albion, and every officer in the township was a Freemason. Of five ministers in the place, four were Masons. All was "peace and harmony" in Albion then. The people began to think, and read the Cynosure, and to talk about Masonry. After a year or two the people elected officers who were not Masons. Hence, the great excitement in Albion.

The Masons were mad, revengeful. An eminent lawyer in the place swore he would have nothing to do with the justice elect or any one who voted that ticket. They published the Presbyterian minister, who was not a Mason, as "bulldozer." They published the Rev. Mr. Hinman, who spoke here, as "an old tramp." The "great excitement in Albion" was notorious throughout the country. I read of it in a Cincinnati paper.

They mobbed Mr. Ronayne in Marshalltown by sending two bands of music to make a noise about the hall so the speaker could not be heard. The second night they cut the gas pipes to darken the room so the third degree could not be worked. But lamps were soon furnished and the work went on. Not long after that, the three men who worked in the gas works lost their lives on one Sunday forenoon. The two workmen went down to see that all was right: they did not return. The superintentent went to see why they did not return: he did not return. Investigation found the two workmen lying dead on the floor; the superintendent was at the foot of the steps dead. The gas had leaked into the work-room and proved fatal. These three men only had anything to do with the gas works. So it is thought that they were responsible for darkening the hall that night. Some think it was a judgment upon them. The gas discharged into the basement of the building for two or three hours, subjecting hundreds of people to be blown up had any one gone in there with a light. Such is the vengeance of that "benevolent" institution!

Five or six of the leading members of the lodge in Albion have left the place and gone to other parts, and Albion has been tolerably quiet for several years past. No Masonic ministers have been preaching here till last fall, when the Methodist conference sent as pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church, a Mason and advocate of Masonry. In a little talk with him he asked me if I "saw Morgan killed."

"No."

"Did you ever see any one who did see Morgan killed?" "No."

"Then you don't know he was killed?"

I asked him if he saw the Saviour crucified. "Did you ever see any one who did see him crucified?" He said "No."

"Then you don't know he was crucified."

He says "every man of a family belongs to a secret society." He is the weakest minded man I ever talked with. He says "if I never was a Mason, I don't know anything about Masonry;" and "the idea of taking their clothing partly off, putting a rope around their neck or body, eyes covered, etc., is false." It is astonishing that a man professing common sense, much less to be under divine influence, will stoop so low to defend an institution that is guilty of murder because he belongs to it, and says "he is demitted." The Masons take new courage; they extol him highly. When such men are sent to preach to parents and children, then Satan rejoices and all good people are sad. A. C. MOFFATT.

A THIRTY-TWO DEGREE MASONIC GOVERNOR ON LICENSE.

Jan. 20th, 1885.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Our infidel Freemason Governor Hoadly, in his recent message to the Legislature recommending the submission to the people of a liquor license amendment to the constitution says: "I cannot advise the submission of a prohibitory amendment." We believe him. No man who is under sworn obligations to saloon-keepers and brewers can do anything of the kind. Nor would his inability to help the temperance cause be any the less were he a "Good Templar," "Son of Temperanee," or any other kind of a temperance lodgite. Mr. Hoadly has a very eorrect appreciation of the situation, for he says: "There will be a ehange. The people of Ohio are in no mood to leave the subject as it is. Free trade in intoxicating drinks has been permitted so long that the patience of the people has been outworn." "The choice is really between lieeense and prohibition. Doubt eannot be entertained that if we fail to secure an effective system of license and taxation prohibition will soon follow."

But here is a glaring inconsisteney: "The most sober nations in the world are those in whieh wine and beer are freely and benefieially used as beverarges and not the most sober are those American States in which resort has been had to legal prohibition." Mark the inconsisteney. If wine and beer have so benifieent an effect in other eountries why do they not have the same effect here? And the governor admits that the people are out of patienee and want a change.

He further says: "The inerease of 40 per eent. from 1880 to 1883 in the number of dealers licensed by the Federal Government to sell intoxicating liquors in the State of Maine plainly indicates that this method of restraint will be ineffectual against the cravings of a common appetite, without the sustaining power of a general public opinion, or of a dominant religious sentiment as in Mahommedan countries."

This last is a fling at Christianity, charaeteristic of the man and his lodge training. The religious sentiment of the eountry is inadequate enough, as every one knows, but we are not ready to exchange it for that of Turkey with its mosques and harems, or of Freemasonry with its despotie titles and bloody eode. As for the asserted increase in the State of Maine he is careful to give only the per cent. of inerease instead of the actual number engaged in the traffie. Thus, if there had been ten dealers in the State in 1880 and fourteen in 1883 the conditions would have been exaetly fulfilled, and yet would not this be prohibition?

It is plain that a systematic effort will be made to carry the State for lieense next fall. Already a bill providing for submitting the question to the people has been introduced in the Legislature, and the Democratic party that was so successful two years ago as the opponent of prohibition will appear as the champion of the measure. Were the election to come off to-morrow it is hard saying what the result would be—the feeling among Republieans against Prohibitionists is so intense. But by the time October rolls around they will have quite forgotten us in their eagerness to eope with their old hereditary enemy, and can be depended on to vote against any measure the Democrats may bring forward—even prohibition itself. So, I think, by the exercise of a little watehfulness and the dissemination of a good deal of truth the State can be prevented from going for lieense. The greatest danger is that the measure will be "counted in" by Masonic officials at the ballot box just as the prohibitory amendment was counted out in 1883. Thus the "handmaid to Christianity and twin-sister of virtue" gets in her work at the most unexpected places and on the most unlooked for occasions.

"But hold," some one says, "has not the Masonic Grand Lodge of Ohio anticipated the people of the State by proclaiming liquor-selling a Masonic offense, punishable with dismissal from membership?" We would feel safe in offering a chromo for every one so dismissed. This is only one of the characteristic dodges of the lodge trotted out and paraded around for the sake of effect. No sooner does any movement become popular than Masonry seizes on it for the purpose of making capital for itself. More anon.

TEMPERANCE CHURCHES.

Your remarks (22 Jan.) referring to the temperance work of Francis Murphy hit the nail on the head, when you say in reference to his formation of churches that "temperance was put first," and you justly characterize this as a "sandy foundation." I agree with you that the church of Christ ought to be enough for Mr. Murphy or any one else. "If not, his and their work will come to naught."

Yes, "to naught" as a church of Christ, but when we see that churches of men multiply like weeds and choke the ground which should bring forth fruit for the Master, we must regard men's churches, of any name or for any specialty other than his Gospel pure and simple, and his positive, visible, symbolical ordinances of it, as worse than nothing, being positive evils which delude men with the idea that they are really churches of Christ. Mormonism and Masonism, and the scores of other isms, may all be classed as delusive substitutes for the pure church of Christ started at Pentecost, developed at different places and instructed by different letters, under the authority of its Lord for this dispensation. T. H.

THE PRESIDENT ELECT.

May I humbly suggest, Mr. Editor, that Bro. McFall's article in Cynosure of the 11th of December, though very able and interesting, used language too strong against Mr. Cleveland. True he is not yet a ruler in fact, he is our President elect. Is the old rule still in force, "Thou shalt not speak evil of the rulers of thy people?" I am unwilling to concede that we are to be ruled by a "booby" till it shall be made evident; and should doubt my right, even then, to use the epithet. This I submit with great respect to our excellent brother. I would hardly dare pray for a booby in the White House. Then it seems to my humble judgment that Mr. Cleveland has shown at least a fair measure of ability. Compared with him in force of character and executive ability, have we not had half a dozen Presidents of no higher type than the President elect? We submit all to the ordeal and test of time. Yours for hope and moderation.—NATHAN CALLENDAR, Thompson, Pa.

FROM BRO. HINMAN'S SOWING.

For the past six months I have been promising myself to write you a letter thanking you or some unknown friend for sending me the Christian Cynosure. It is a paper I welcome every week, and I am an advocate of its principles. Three years ago I had my mind fully made up to enter one of the secret societies, but Rev. H. H Hinman came along and lectured where I was attending school (Howard University) in Washington, D. C., and just put me on his side. Then I read all your tracts, one of your books, and everything I can catch hold of so as to post me on the subject and preach it when I can. I have given the subject much study in the past two years I hope the paper will continue to come, as it is one of my teachers.—JAS. S. WALKER, Hillsboro, N. C.

AN OLD WITNESS.

I have had many Masons tell me there never was such a man as Morgan. I lived within ninety miles of Batavia when he was siezed and was 28 years old. I have seen a number of persons who were well acquainted with Morgan and Greene. We who lived in that day will soon be gone; then it may be harder to make the people believe the truth.—MOSES FERRIN, Ellington, N. Y.

DON'T UNDERSTAND IT.

It was said, "A man votes right if he votes as he pleases;" but, according to an idea of some Republicans here in Iowa, a man has no right to please to vote for St. John and not backslide from Prohibition, because it is half a vote for Cleveland, but any one has a right to give a whole vote for Cleveland, which whole votes have all been counted. Why half a vote for Cleveland is worse than than a whole one, many of which we believe have not been counted, we believe must be one of the hidden mysteries.—CYRUS SMITH.

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. Consciousness of right gives that calmness and strength which maks us gentle to our adversaries. v. 1. "Let your moderation (in revised version 'your forbearance') be known unto all men." Truth cannot afford to spend her strength in invectives. She knows a more excellent way. Not the least remarkable part of this remarkable address is the dignified courtesy with which it begins. Doubtless it had its effect, among other things, in causing the awe-struck silence that fell on the rabble which a moment before were clamoring for his blood. The supporters of evil are always the ones to rant and bluster. We see this fact illustrated in the defenders of secret orders. But hard names are not arguments, and all their anger and abuse only prove to reasonable minds the folly of their cause.

2. Men are convinced most easily when we meet them on a common ground. vs. 2–5. Paul might have used the noble and polished Greek. But he preferred instead the rugged Hebrew, their common mother tongue, dear with old home memories and patriotic associations. Here is an important lesson for all Christian workers. When we would win souls to Christ, or convince men of error in practice or doctrine let us speak to them in the words of common every day life. Simplicity is power. The Bible, Pilgrim's Progress, and our best hymns are written in plain Saxon; the world's grandest sayings are couched in monosyllables. Paul knew that between him and the mob he addressed, abhorrent as their bloodthirsty fanaticism must have been to a mind enlightened by the Holy Spirit, there were yet many points in common. He had been a Pharisee of the Pharisees—none more zealous for the law than he—and more than that a persecutor. Between the Christian worker and every soul he would reach there is always some basis of unity—one argument that even an angel could not use—"I, too, have been a sinner."

3. One sight of Christ transforms, renews, and gives martyr courage. vs. 6–21. Infidels like Hume, who cavil at the miracle of Paul's conversion, forget that there remains a greater miracle for which to account—his radically changed life. Note the humble question of this before proud Pharisee, "What shall I do, Lord?" The truly penitent soul is willing to do anything for his Master. "The God of our fathers hath chosen thee." We can only accept our mission; God chooses it. "And now why tarriest thou?" When the command comes "Be swift, my soul, to answer him." The very word "Gentiles" roused the passions of the mob, as the word abolitionist in slavery time, or anti-secretist now. The lapse of ages does not alter the original tendency of human nature. But when the Lord sends his servants on missions even the naming of which rouses fury and hate, it is not at their own charges. Though granted no bodily vision like Paul's, he gives them to look upon him by the eye of faith, and they "endure as seeing him who is invisible."

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

Who under very similar circumstances began an address to his murderers in the same courteous strain? Acts 7: 2; 22: 20. What greater example of Christian forbearance? Heb. 12: 3. Is every conversion a miracle of Divine grace? Jer. 13: 23.

PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS.

1, 2. Christian love makes one tender and forbearing even in the most exasperating circumstances. Paul remembered that he had been once in the same state of darkness as now enveloped his assailers, and his heart beat with compassion towards them. If we wish to "in meekness instruct those who oppose themselves," let us try to put ourselves in their places.

At this and other times Paul realizes the fulfillment of the Saviour's promise: "When they deliver you up, take no thought how or what ye shall speak; for it shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak." Thus God is faithful to all his promises.

3–5. Knowledge is power, but unsanctified learning may only place a weapon of destruction in the enemy's hand. There was perhaps no one in Jerusalem who excelled Saul in knowledge, energy and zeal, but this very fact made his name a terror to the godly. We must cast the salt of divine grace into our schools and colleges, or else we may train only an army which will make havoc of the faith.

It is not true that "it makes no difference what I believe if I an only sincere;" no one was ever more sincere than Paul was while persecuting the church, but that did not lighten the sufferings of the persecuted or lessen the perils of his own soul. I may sincerely believe a poisonous root to be nourishing food, but my sincerity will not prevent its deadly work if I partake of it. The merchant may sincerely believe that prices are advancing, but his sincerity will not prevent loss if he purchase a large stock when the very reverse is true. So, if I sincerely believe an error my mind is poisoned by receiving it, and the hopes which I stake upon my belief in it will certainly be disappointed.

6–13. It was the glory of Christ's presence that made Saul sensible of his unworthiness. So it is when we measure our character by the holiness of Jesus, the perfect man, that we behold our sinfulness before God. For this reason no study is more profitable than that of Christ's perfectness.

Paul's first question after conversion was, "Who art thou, Lord?" So the person, character and work of Jesus is always the first subject of inquiry by the converted soul.

Jesus identifies himself perfectly with his people and their interests; therefore every insult or injury done to them is offered to Jesus himself. "It was Jesus that was stoned in Stephen, flayed in Bartholomew, roasted on St. Lawrence's gridiron, and burned in Polycarp."—Bengel.

The men with Paul saw the external signs of Christ's presence and power, but they did not hear his message to the new-born soul. There are many to-day who hear the external Gospel call, but are strangers to the inward power of the Holy Ghost.

Paul waited three days in darkness before the light came; but they were not days of idleness, we believe they were evidently days of prayer and fasting. "Who is among you that feareth the Lord, that obeyeth the voice of his servant, that walketh in darkness, and hath no light? let him trust in the name of the Lord, and stay upon his God." Isa. 50: 10.

14–21. We must first know Jesus as our own personal Saviour before we can be his true witnesses.

The Lord knows where we can serve him most efficiently better than we do. Paul thought his testimony would be most efficient at Jerusalem. Jesus told him that it would not be received there at all, and the sequel showed how correct were his words. Why, therefore, should we seek places to which the Lord has never called us? Why should we not be more content and joyous in the field of labor where God has evidently placed us by his providence?"—The U. P. Bible Teacher.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.
2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.
3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.
4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.
5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.
7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punisbment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.
8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.
9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.
10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.
11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.
12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.
13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.
14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.
15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

EDITORS.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1885.

URGENT!!

Let it be the BUSINESS of every reader of this paper for the first day after reading this note to get signers to the Protest on page 13. See 1st page.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.—The W. C. T. U. is asking our Springfield Legislature to submit woman suffrage to the vote of the people. We hope Representative Hiatt will not be found wanting.

PRES. C. A. BLANCHARD, of Wheaton College, lately lectured in Paxton, Ill., on Freemasonry. A writer who signs himself "Cuppy," in the Paxton Record gives a witty and humorous review of the lecture, in which he compliments the President, and insinuates, rather than makes a defence of the lodge.

Rev. Wm. W. Blanchard, of Paxton, uncle of the former, replies to "Cuppy" in the Register, whose editor takes up the gauntlet, and a discussion runs through several numbers. Mr. Blanchard's articles are able and adroit, and we are told the people of Paxton have been stirred by the discussion. It is expected that President Blanchard will visit them again.

A CONFERENCE AND CONCILIATION COMMITTEE was appointed by the Wheaton College church on Thursday evening last to remove if possible all causes of alienation between it and the First Congregational church in Wheaton. These churches were separated seven years ago, and though hostility and hatred have disappeared and the two churches have co-operated in union meetings, there are some difficulties not yet removed. The friends of Wheaton and its College are requested to pray for the committee of conciliation, which is to meet February 12. The committee consists of seven good men and the College church has chosen a representative committee of three of their own members, and ask the other church to be represented. Dr. Bascom of Hinsdale, Ill., suggested the arrangement.

OUR STORY.—The Union Signal (Mrs. M. B. Willard) goes into all corners of the United States bearing an admirable notice of Miss E. E. Flagg's serial which appears weekly in the Cynosure. It is an agreeable compliment, well and worthily bestowed. Here follows a part of it:

"A serial story is running through the weekly issues of the Christian Cynosure, entitled, 'Between two Opinions,' and written by Miss Flagg, author of 'Holden with Cords.' It is emphatically a story of our times, a story so filled with our thought and purpose that one cannot help wondering, as she reads, if this is to be the great novel of the Temperance Reform, the story that is sure to be, sometime, in somebody's brain. Note in the following brave defense, how she disposes of the sharp 'quack-quack' of that common, cheap criticism which has too often turned its sharpest edge back upon the critic, 'For my part, I think mothers would do more to stop intemperance by staying at home and training their children to avoid its evils.' She says:

" 'Would it satisfy a mother, who knew that a panther was ranging over the country, to procure a work on zoology, and gathering her children about her show them how a panther looks? Would she consider it enough to give them a familiar description of its haunts and habits, and warn them to be careful when they went berrying to keep a sharp lookout for its gleaming eyes, its stealthy tread, its cruel spring? Would she not, rather, if she had a true mother's heart in her bosom, shoulder a good trusty gun—if there was no one else to do it—and attempt herself the death of the monster?' "

EPISCOPALIAN MASONS.

The Interior has once opened its columns to a discussion of Masonry from a Presbyterian standpoint, and in its prospectus for the present volume enumerates the lodge among evils which it opposes. For this brave action it merits the thanks of Christendom. In the last number, Jan. 29th, Mr. Gray gives us a sharp touch of Scotch humor. The Standard of the Cross prints that Dr. H. V. V. Johnson (Episcopalian) was snow buried with eighty passengers in the Cascade Mountains for twenty-four days. They ate up everything eatable in the express car, and might have starved but for the good Dr.'s Masonic sign of distress, which brought thirty men tied together with a rope, to their snow sepulchre, with thirty pounds of provision each. The good Dr. asks, "Would the church have done this? I hope it would; but I knew the Masons would answer a 'sign of distress,' and they did at the risk of their lives."

On this the Interior observes: "From which we are to infer that if the good Reverend Doctor had not been able to send the Masonic sign of distress those thirty Masons would have left eighty men to starve and freeze to death. From such charity, good Lord, deliver us!"

Permit the Cynosure editor to add that we were in those parts in 1864, and of our personal knowledge the lodges of those mountain regions contained gamblers, swindlers, concealed bandits and murderers with open blacklegs, whore-mongers, etc., etc.—men who cared no more for God, or the Sabbath, or religion, than the mustangs they rode; yet they were all good brothers of this good Episcopalian doctor in the lodge.

"MURDER FOR TRUTH-TELLING."

We are in receipt a courteous letter from J. Q. A. Campbell, editor of the Republican, Bellefontaine, Ohio, who complains of our article (Jan. 22) under the above caption as "slanderous," and asks that we correct the statement so far as the Republican is concerned. The editor further sends us four scraps which he says are "all that have appeared in my paper touching the matter," (i. e., Mr. Cook's funeral handbill, etc.)

Our statement was, that "the county papers" contained hints and suggestions of murder of the author of the handbill; and we named the Republican as one of them. From the editor's letter, which says, "I was not at the funeral and do not know what either of the ministers said; nor have I read what either of the other papers said of the matter;" we think the Republican should not be classed with the other papers as inciting to murder.

Our correspondent sent scraps from the "local press," which declare that the writer of the handbill should be "tarred and feathered;" but that this (tar and feathers) "would not appease the popular fury;" that "detectives have been put on his track," and "if his identity shall be disclosed, may the Lord have mercy on him!" This certainly means he will be killed. We are glad to note that the Republican does not endorse these outrageous sentiments.

A NEW ENGLAND MEETING AT NORTH AMPTON.

LETTER FROM SENATOR POMEROY.

Read below the interesting and important letter of Senator Pomeroy. This gentleman, while he was the most popular United States Senator from the West, in 1869, being in Chicago to receive blooded English cattle and being invited, addressed our N. C. A. in Farwell Hall, in a calm, clear and eminently statesmanlike speech. The lodge poured out its dragon-flood of villification upon him, as it has since on St. John, but he has shrunk in neither nerve nor muscle. Whoever read his skech in the Cynosure last year, saw therein a full-length portrait of a Christan gentleman and statesman.

The New England meeting, which Senator Pomeroy so forcibly urges, was voted unanimously by a consulting committee in February, a year ago, but has been delayed by Secretary Stoddard under the impression that Prof. Bailey, of the American, was opposed to it. This impression seems to have been a mistake, as Mr. Bailey writes us now, (Jan. 27): "From the first I favored the meeting, and do yet," and adds: "I was urgent to have a paper circulated committing the signers to anti-secrecy and calling for a convention," etc., etc.

This is what the Cynosure editors and men in the office advocate, and Mr. Stoddard took his request for a call in part form the words of Mr. Bailey; and, as his letter shows, Senator Pomeroy ably advocates the meeting. A New England meeting, called by ten thousand signers with Senator Pomeroy's opening speech from the chair, on The Lodge vs. Puritanism," graced by the attendance of Bros. Seeley, Gough, Cook and Miner, is what we want. Read the letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 26, 1885.

Prest. Blanchard, Ed. Cynosure:

My Dear Brother:—I see a proposition in your paper for some public meetings in New England, in aid of our common cause, and one proposed for May next, in the good old town of Northampton.

I am in hearty sympathy with the movement, and believe a word should now be spoken to our people "to move forward." If New England leads we shall gladly follow, for light rises in the East.

The mad passions, engendered by the defeat of a political party will, by that time, have measurably subsided, and the people will be again willing to listen to the dangers of secret dynamite societies, and all other societies, where they hide their doings from public scrutiny. "Let there be Light," should be the appeal of earnest and honest men. In the public gaze soon the grossest errors may be harmless.

I am, etc, etc., S. C. POMEROY.

ST. JOHN AND AMERICANS.

Our excellent friend, Dr. S. Collins, President of the National Convention, writes reminding me that I once wrote him: "One thing you and the readers of the Cynosure can rely on, i. e., you shall know the best and the worst, come what will; and then you can form your own conclusions."

The "best" is that after a week spent in Olathe, and constant intercourse with St. John's neighbors, and frequent interviews with himself, I have entire confidence in his veracity, and believe all he said to Senator Pomeroy and others before the election, to wit, that he utterly forsook and left the Masonic lodge some eighteen years ago; that though initiated as a Good Templar, he has quit that also; that he says the same things to John B. Finch and other secretists, that he has said to us; that, in short, he is a downright honest man. But the Cynosure has said repeatedly that Americans cannot consistently vote for any but those who openly and publicly accept our platform, only as an exception to their general rule. Therefore, I shall not vote for Gov. St. John as I did in the last election unless he writes us a letter accepting our platform. He has expressed to me his purpose to write us a public letter; and though I do not wish to hurry him, I expect he will do so before he comes again before us for his votes.

DEVILS.—That evil should have affected superior orders of beings and, from them, reacted upon our own race, is not only not in conflict with reason, but asserted throughout the whole course of Scripture.—Isaac Taylor.

The Revelation (ch. 12, v. 9.) states that these higher intelligences became fiends, were driven from higher spheres and "cast out into the earth," and that their chief "deceiveth the whole world." And Moses (Deut. 32: 17) and Paul (1 Cor. 10: 20) state that the religions of the nations (Gentiles) being Christless and so having no way to God are all devils' religions, teaching salvation by ceremonies; as if men could lift themselves to heaven by taking hold of their own boot-straps. All priestly inventions are such religions. Christ being our sole mediator and permanent Priest, all others now are counterfeits.

Paganism, Mormonism, Masonry and Popery are such false or devils' opposition religions, and they never will fall till the Bible is clearly understood and taught concerning them.

WISCONSIN FRIENDS are reqested by Rev. W. W. Ames, of Menomonee, Dunn county, their State Secretary, to look about and make a list of the names of all sympathizers with the reform and send them to him. Let this information be given just as soon as possible for the greater efficiency of the State work. It is only a small contribution for each to make and may result in mighty things for Wisconsin.

—From the office of the new Birmingham Free Press we learn that the lodges feel the poke of a long pole, and are far from happy, as they hear the cannonade from the new battery. It is even feared that a watch may have to be put upon the office lest a Masonic crowd form a neighboring town Morganize press and type.

—Among our selections this week is an extract from the essay of Rev. N. Wardner, before the Ministerial Conference of his church in Wisconsin. In the last number of the Sabbath Recorder there is a reply to Elder Wardner by A. S. Dunham, a Mason and Odd-fellow. But the Recorder nobly shows its colors in an editorial condemning, in the name of Jesus Christ, the whole lodge business. The argument is brief but forcible and the Cynosure will reprint.

REFORM NEWS.

FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

BATAVIA, N. Y.

The communion of saints is precious and I was greatly blessed and strengthened while worshiping with the free church in this city. The hospitality and helpfulness of brother and sister Palmer will not be soon forgotten, and the faces of brother and sister King are a perfect benison, and their home a resting place for the weary pilgrim. Bro. Newell showed me much kindness, and Miss Sarah Stevens is rendering great service in looking up the dispersed members of the Morgan, Miller and Harris families. When I say of her that she is among the most remarkable women that I have met, it is simply a tribute merited by her fearless and indefatigable efforts to wrest the history of one of the bloodiest deeds of Masonic vengeance from oblivion.

The Morgan monument stands without a stain, a spot, or a scratch, and is visited and admired, I am told, by many who come from far and have heard the fame thereof in their own lands. "It is a thing of beauty," and in all my travels I have never met with any thing that leaves a more pleasing impression than this tribute to the heroism of a man who braved the vengeance of a bloody and relentless conspiracy. I hope to visit ere long Mr. R. F. Carter of Ryegate, Vt., and personally assure him of the entire satisfaction given by both material and workmanship "under the test of time."

I am late to my appointment in Connecticut, but snows and storms cannot be escaped in this world, and assisted by the "good hand of our God," and aided by the prayers of his people I hope to make amends for the delay.

ALBANY, Jan. 26.—Can any good come from the work of the dynamiters? I find people much interested in the work of these human fiends and quite ready to express opinions about it. I had a few words with an intelligent and cultured gentleman today on the train. He came recently from his home in England, and gave it as his opinion that the outrages committed would lead to an investigation of the whole system of secret societies. He had given but little attention to Masonry and Odd-fellowship, but from what he knew had come to the conclusion that they were supremely foolish. We had but a few moments before he left the train, but I tried to improve them in giving him a few points and informing him where he could obtain further light. There is not only dense ignorance but a terrible apathy on the part of the general public regarding the work and objects of secret societies, and it may be that nothing less than dynamite explosions will arouse men from the stupor and indifference into which they have fallen. Let us hope that some good may result from these unparalled outrages, and pray God especially to overrule this frenzied wrath of maddened desperadoes to his glory and the salvation of the people from the secret empire of which the dynamiters are only a diabolical expression.

THE BATTLE IN NEW YORK.

FREDONIA, N. Y., Jan, 24, 1885.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Bro. Starry opened fire on the powers of darkness here last night by working the third degree. He was expected to have worked the first on the evening of the 21st, but was detained by circumstances beyond his control. Notwithstanding attractions at the skating-rink and other places, Temperance Hall was well filled at an early hour with an eager audience, a number of the fraternity being present.

Scarcely had the ceremonies commenced when a man giving his name as Smith Brown arose and with a volley of oaths denounced Bro. Starry as an impostor. Others sprang to their feet; some half a dozen were talking at once. We ordered them seated and as soon as quiet was restored the work went on. It would be needless for me to particularize the occurrences of the evening. It is the old story, so well known to those who have been present at the working of the degrees. Business men, respected as such in this community, called us almost every conceivable name that the devil could suggest. Oath followed oath. A Knight Templar was sent for to assist in the disturbance. In spite of all that we could do it was impossible to keep order.

This morning Bro. Starry and myself met Smith Brown at the hotel according to agreement. Mr. B. agreed to be there at 10 o'clock and give his affidavit that not one word of what Bro. S. had said was true.

A large number of men gathered. Mr. B., of course, only called us names and refused to do as he had agreed. Several friends came to our rescue. We took our departure and left the others to do the arguing. Numbers of men may be seen on nearly every street corner eagerly discussing the meeting of last night.

As we came along we heard one Mason say that he would bet $5 Bro. S. would be murdered or die in the insane asylum in less than five years. We soon take a train for Forestville, where we hope to push the battle on.

CATTARAUGUS, N. Y., Jan. 30.

The war has fairly begun. Since we last wrote you we have been very busy with our meetings. Bros. Starry, Mallory and myself have had appointments every evening since Sabbath. Monday and Tuesday evenings working in Villenova Wesleyan church, Wednesday and last evenings in Pine Valley. Notwithstanding the severe cold weather we have had good houses every night. They work to-night and to-morrow night in Forestville, coming to Cattaraugus for work on Monday evening.

Marked interest has been manifested at each meeting, many coming for miles to see how a man could be made a Mason. The fraternity also have presented their usual arguments with the usual results. Last evening's meeting was especially interesting. The Masons of Pine Valley gathered en-mass and marching into the church, occupied the front seats. Some took seats to represent the officers in the lodge. Rage and revenge were plainly manifested in their every act, at times hissing like geese, sometimes barking like dogs. Curses mingled with threats were profuse. They had threatened the night before to rottten-egg us if we attempted to go on with our work. Guess they were short of eggs; at least we saw none of them. Many came forward at the close of the exercises and expressed themselves heartily in sympathy with our work. Said they had never known the deep damnation of this institution until they saw the actions of those who had been duped by it. The Masonic arguments were complete, and the people went to their homes convinced, as they could not have been in any other way.

A REVIVAL FOLLOWS A STATE CONVENTION.

MONROE, Wis., Jan. 22, 1885.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Our State meeting is over and I am home again to rest a little. I am not well yet of my fall received some months ago, and I think it is rheumatism that prevents it; so I thought I would stay at home until it warms up a little. Bro. Ames has written up our State meeting, but I wish to say a few words more. I think it the best one I have ever attended in Wisconsin. From first to last we had good attendance, and good order, and deep and close attention, and we had some good testimony. A gentleman rose in one meeting and said that he handed one of our Odd-fellow books to a member of that order in the village, and after looking it over for an hour or more, he returned it, saying that it was a correct expose of Odd-fellowship. A granger, a member of the Seventh-Day Baptist church, said to me at the close of one meeting that he should go into but one more grange and that would be for the purpose of saying to the lodge that he was to leave them forever, because they had no Christ there.

Bro. Ronayne held the audience spell-bound every time he spoke, and we have left him there to take the whole place for Christ. I know there are many inquiring souls there and I am very sure God has sent him to lead them from the secret lodge worships of the devil to the Lord Jesus Christ. I think the Lord has prepared the way for a great work. Pray that the good Lord will carry it on to perfection.

THE NEW YORK STATE MEETING.

THE RESOLUTIONS.

RESOLVED, 1. That as citizens of the State of New York, and members of the State Christian Association opposed to secret societies, we reaffirm our solemn purpose to adhere to the principles set forth in the organic instrument of our State Association, and of the National Christian Association as declared in the second section of its act of incorporation, viz., "It shall be the business and object of this association to expose, withstand, and remove all secret societies, especially Freemasonry, and all other anti-Christian movements, in order to save the churches of Christ from being depraved; to redeem the administration of justice from perversion; and our Republican government from corruption."

2. While disclaiming alliance with any sect or party as an association of believers, we do nevertheless avow our conviction that connection with any secret lodge that binds its members to show partiality towards a portion of their fellow citizens, or the use of intoxicating liquors disqualifies any person for holding civil office, and such person should not receive the votes or support of patriotic citizens.

3. We hold that prohibition of the importation, manufacture, sale, and use of intoxicating liquors is the true policy on the temperance question, and that it is the duty of temperance people to labor to secure the enforcement of prohibition by town, county, State, and National legislation.

4. While regretting the bitterness engendered by the late political canvas, which too often finds expression in unguarded utterances, we do nevertheless, affirm and insits upon the right of every legal voter to cast his ballot as in his judgment will best promote the greatest good of our common country.

5. We hold that integrity and intelligence should be the test of suffrage in a Republican State, rather than sex or previous conditions; and, therefore, we favor giving the ballot to all duly qualified citizens regardless of sex or nationality.

6. We recognize in the W. C. T. U. an agency raised up of God to do a great work, and we heartily commend these noble, self-sacrificing women for the stand they have taken in prohibition and bid them Godspeed in their efforts.

7. That in the Christian Cynosure we have an able advocate of our principles and heartily commend both it and the American to the patronage and support of our friends.

W. B. Stoddard submitted his report and was heartily commended in the resolution following:

Resolved, That in view of the labors and self-sacrificing services of W. B. Stoddard, our State agent, we can most heartily recommend him as an earnest and faithful worker in the cause, and we take pleasure in commending him to the sympathy and support of the friends of reform in this State and elsewhere.

THE SECRET EMPIRE.

—The city of Ottawa, Ill., is cursed with twenty-eight secret organizations belonging to the following orders: Freemasons, Odd-fellows, United Workmen, Grand Army, Knights of Pythias, Knights of Honor, Catholic Total Abstinence Society, Hibernians, Turn Verein, B'nai B'rith, Kesher Shel Barsel, American Legion of Honor, French Mutual Benevolent Society, Good Templars, and Royal Templars of Temperance.

—The Catholic Benevolent Legion is one of the secret orders among the Romanists of this city.

— A Mr. J. D. Mack, who has attended the meetings of the Socialists in this city writes indignantly of them to the Inter-Ocean:

"I think it is a shame to allow a handful of gibbering idiots, known as Socialists, to utter such inflammatory speeches—not that they amount to much. I attended their meeting at Twelfth Street Turner Hall, Sunday, and I must say that I never witnessed such a disgraceful scene in all my life. They advertised for their opponents to meet them in debate. A few respectable citizens attempted to address the mob, but were hooted off the stage. These speakers and chairmen of these meetings live off poor, ignorant workingmen, and ought to be arrested. I think their proper home ought to be at Joliet."

—The Wisconsin State Council of the Catholic Knights of America met at Green Bay, Jan. 21, and proposed to secede from the National Council because of unfair taxation. Final action was not taken.

—A New York dispatch some days ago says that the Phelan stabbing case still continues a topic of speculation among Irishmen in that city. The little editorial room of O'Donovon-Rossa's paper, where the stabbing took place, is the meeting place for the men who have been stirred up from their seclusion by it, and it was crowded by some angry-looking dynamiters, who eagerly but secretly discussed the situation. It was learned that a special meeting of the Council of the Fenian Brotherhood had been held the night previous at the residence of one of the members and that the affray was the subject discussed. It is generally believed that Phelan gave information to President Arthur on which he based his references to dynamite outrages in his last message to Congress. It is not known what action the brotherhood took at their meeting. It developed, however, that strenuous efforts were being made to induce Mrs. Phelan to persuade her husband not to appear against Short, the would be assassin. The latter's friends were approaching her in different ways by threats and entreaties. The dispatch adds: "Since her arrival here she has been the recipient of a number of threatening letters against the Captain should he take any part in the prosecution of the accused man. She is also in daily receipt of numberless notes from her own sex, imploring her to intercede with her husband and leave nothing undone to induce him to go back to Kansas City as soon as convalescent and let the whole matter drop. Phelan, however, still insists upon pushing matters to the end, and expects to appear in court within ten days. He is improving very rapidly and will soon be discharged from the hospital. The assassin, Short, has not yet spoken to any one except intimate friends. He persistently refuses to talk with any one about the affair.

—The Oriental Consistory, Sovereign Princes of the Royal Secret of this city lately inaugurated a series of informal receptions with a dancing party. The parlors, drill-room and other chambers were opened. The dancing was in the drill-room. There are to be two more dances of the same kind Feb. 19 and March 19.

—The Odd-fellows of Washington are anxious for a revival. Grand Master Montis, of the District of Columbia, has offered a prize of a gold badge to the Odd-fellow who presents in his own lodge the largest number of applications for initiation from now to June 30, 1885.

— The Knights of Pythias order will be twenty-one years old Feb. 19, 1885. The Grand Chancellor urges the order to have a good time congratulating themselves on a growth from 5 to 150,000 members. They have an aggregate life insurance of over $45,000,000. Who is going to pay it?

—It is said that Judge Anthony Thornton, once a member of the Supreme Court of Illinois, was recently raised to the degree of Master Mason in Jackson Lodge No. 53, at Shelbyville, Ill. The Judge is nearly three score and ten years of age, and is believed to be one of the oldest men that ever took the degree of Master Mason. In this performance the lodge evidently strained two of its rules, against initiating men in their dotage, and taking in "fools."

THE HOME.

THE BRIDGE OF LIFE.

Across the rapid stream of seventy years,
The slender bridge of human life is thrown:
The past and future form its mouldering piers:
The present moment is its frail keystone;

From "dust thou art" the arch begins to rise,
"To dust" the fashion of its form descends,
"Shalt thou return," the higher curve implies,
In which the first to the last lowness bends.

Seen by youth's magic light upon the arch,
How lovely does each far off scene appear!
But ah! how changed when on the onward march,
Our weary footsteps bring the vision near!

'Twas fabled that beneath the rainbow's foot
A treasure lay, the dreamer to bewitch:
And many wasted in the vain pursuit
The golden years that would have made them rich.

So where life's arch of many colors leads,
The heart expects rich wealth of joy to find;
But in the distance the bright hope recedes.
And leaves a cold gray waste of care behind.

A sunlit stream upon its bosom takes
The inverted shadow of a bridge on high
And thus the arch in air and water makes
One perfect circle to the gazer's eye.

So 'tis with life: the things that do appear
Are fleeting shadows on time's passing tide,
Cast by the sunshine of a higher sphere,
From viewless things that changelessly abide.

The real is but the half of life; it needs
The ideal to make a perfect whole;
The sphere of sense is incomplete, and pleads
The closer union with the sphere of soul.

All things of use are bridges that conduct
To things of faith, which give them truest worth;
And Christ's own parables do us instruct
That heaven is but the counterpart of earth.

The pier that rests upon this shore's the same
As that which stands upon the further bank:
And fitness for our duties here will frame
A fitness for the joys of higher rank.

Oh! dark were life without heaven's sun to show
The likeness of the other world in this:
And bare and poor would be our lot below
Without the shadow of a world of bliss.

Then let us, passing o'er life's fragile arch,
Regard it as a means, and not an end;
As but the path of faith on which we march
To where all glories of our being tend.

THE AFRICAN MISSIONARY BISHOP.

The appointment of William Taylor as missionary bishop for Africa by the Methodist Episcopal General Conference was one of the wisest acts of that body. He undertakes his work untrammelled by instructions or the rules of societies, and the first result is the embarking of a company of forty consecrated missionaries. The charter under which he works he acknowledges thus in one of his letters:

A few words, if you please, about the missionary short cut for the salvation of the world.

The key to the divine power requisite, and how to use it, is contained in the last words of the ascending Jesus: "Ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you, and ye shall be witnesses unto me unto the uttermost parts of the earth." This divine power is in the ever-abiding Holy Spirit, and on the line of heart loyalty to God, and a continuous reception of Jesus is as available as God's provision of food for our bodies.

The key to God's material resources, deposited in earth, air, and water, to the uttermost parts of the earth, is contained in the marching orders of the first band of gospel missionaries sent out. Jesus, having called and commissioned them, said: "Behold, I send you forth as lambs among wolves,"—a fair prospect for a living for the wolves, but not for the lambs. He forbade them to take with them "purse or scrip," nor an extra coat or pair of sandals. No need of a purse, for money-making was not the business on which they were sent. No need of a scrip (a bag) in which to carry their provisions, for God's vast and varied supplies of nature awaiting them were to be tapped and utilized on the commercial principle of correlative equivalents—value for value—only in this case the infinite values of "spiritual things" were put against the "small matters" of "carnal things." "The laborer is worthy of his meat." "They who preach the gospel shall live by the gospel" they preach.

When these missionaries returned, and reported their success, they were so jubilant that they forgot to mention the financial aspect of their work till Jesus drew them out by the question, "Lacked ye anything?" They had no deficiency to report.

Their tour was so short that no "transit fund" was needed; but St. Paul's wider range of advance in this work required that the church should help the missionaries on their way to those in darkness beyond; for, says Paul, "How can they hear without a preacher, and how can they preach except they be sent?"

The Master's method is literally practicable and adequate now, and infinitely superior to any such misapplication of beneficence as may practically supersede the utilization of his indigenous resources. It is, however, the spirit of his teaching facts rather than the literal form of them that we are to study and follow. We need not be jolted along in a horse car, to the time of four miles an hour, when we can enter a palace car, drawn by a fiery steed at the rate of forty or fifty.

The enlightened nations are continually pushing their way with their accumulated resources of mind, muscle, and money, to tap and to utilize the material resources of the darker regions, and to transmute those indigenous resources into railroads, halls of science, and productive industries of every kind. The church in like manner should employ her accumulating resources in men and money to tap and to utilize God's indigenous resources in foreign countries, at least for the adequate support of his gospel messengers. Satan is taking this tide at the flood for the destruction of men. Why should not God's people make the most of this opportunity for the salvation of men?

The thing is to strike the right line between a missionary charity, most appropriate to real objects of charity, and adequate and reproductive indigenous support for God's ambassadors. The dividing line intimated to me by the Spirit of the Lord, in India, twelve years ago, was to depend entirely on India resources for the support of all our ministers, school teachers, and their families, and to welcome the co-operation of God's stewards in Christian countries in providing money for our "transit and building-fund." With unfaltering and ever-increasing faith in this plan of planting missions, we confess to a great want of skill and efficiency in its application; but God is with us; and hence, despite all disabilities within and opposing forces without, we report a hopeful exhibit of facts as an index to the progress of this work.

THE GREAT MOVEMENT IN AFRICA.

The interior of Africa has long been a sealed book. We have been ignorant of its inhabitants, animals, plants, and minerals; indeed, its whole geography has been a blank until very recent years. But the scene there is rapidly changing, and intense interest now centers around this hitherto unknown, and still desolate, part of the earth. However, only a beginning has been made. Large tracts of unexplored land, along the equator, and north and south of it are still in the embrace of a long night of years, with no evidence yet that the day is breaking and shadows fleeing away. The agencies penetrating the midnight darkness is the new state of the Congo valley, and about Lakes Nyassa and Tanganyika have many difficulties to encounter, but they are doing a noble work.

Henry Drummond has just returned from a tour through central Africa, and by way of a lecture has given his impressions to the public. He speaks enthusiastically of the work "The African Lakes Company" is doing. The object of the lecturer in going to Africa was purely a scientific one, but in all the places visited the missionary had been there before him, trying to teach the inhabitants the way of life.

The Established church of Scotland has planted a mission up the Zambezi river, beyond the grave of the devoted David Livingstone. This important mission is called Blantyre. The Free church of Scotland has pushed farther into the interior, and planted the well-known mission station called Livingstonia on Lake Nyassa. This church has placed upon its waters a little missionary steamboat called Itala, in memory of the place where David Livingstone died, and as a token that the little steamer was to take up the work where he laid it down. The church has been compelled to abandon Livingstonia on account of the breaking out of a pestilence which carried to their graves five of the missionaries. They have moved two hundred miles farther up, and established another Livingstonia, in a more healthy location. Here a school has been opened and a little church erected, where Sabbath after Sabbath, between two and three hundred naked natives, with sable faces, listen to the Gospel in their own language.

To engage in such work requires sacrifice, but the pleasure it brings is far in excess of the privations endured. To watch the mind as it grasps the ideas of civilization, and catch the overflow of the heart, as it melts under the power of the Holy Spirit are the purest enjoyments.

The lecturer says: "Perhaps the most useful thing I could do, first of all, would be to try and sketch for a moment the look of the country where our Central African mission work is carried on. A great difficulty we have about mission work is a difficulty of imagination and realization—of having in our minds a living picture of the thing itself. Central Africa is one enormous forest—thousands and thousands of miles of forest, sometimes thrown into great mountains, but still covered with forest, and sometimes into long, sweeping valleys. In some places there are lakes in these valleys in which England might lie. Lake Nyassa is three hundred and fifty miles long. That is the region occupied by our Scottish mission work. This forest is not a dense, dark, umbrageous forest like those in northern Europe or in America; nor is it a tangled jungle, like the forests of India. It is a thin forest of small-sized trees, thin-branched and thin-leaved. If you try to picture that in your mind you have Central Africa as it is to-day. Thousands and thousands of miles of forest—shadeless, because the trees are too thin to keep out the rays of the tropical sun; voiceless, because the animals that inhabit it are night animals. All day long it is as silent as the grave.

"Hidden away like bird's nests in a wood, there are little native villages, and in these native villages you find man in his primal simplicity, without any knowledge of the great world outside, without any Sabbath, without any Bible, without any God—without any substitute for God at present. For in that part of the world they have not yet got to the length of having idols. Till within the last few years they have never seen a white man. There they live like wild beasts, or like children of nature, with no care for the morrow or the future.

"Three kind hands have been stretched out from my country to save that land. The first, whose name I suppose has never before been mentioned in a missionary meeting, is "The African Lake Company." That company is not composed of missionaries; it is composed of wealthy merchants. These men have their hearts in Africa. They said to themselves—'We have watched civililation mysteriously over the world, and we have noticed that wherever it has gone gone it has carried with it the vices of Europe. Here is a great stretch of forest land where no white man has ever yet been. We will try to keep it pure; we will go into it ourselves; we will buy ivory from the people and sell them cloth; we will send kind, picked men to lead them to a knowledge of God; we will keep out brandy, and gunpowder, and guns.' They are setting themselves to do this. They have picked men wandering about those forests trying to teach the natives to trade. In some cases these men have established little Sabbath-schools, and are helping the people to know about God and salvation. It is as yet a little work, but it is one worthy of honorable mention in any missionary meeting. That work is going to extend. They want to get more such picked men—men without any college training, who will go out simply as Christian business men and show the natives what honest trading is. At present they have a monopoly; no other traders have ever set foot as yet in those regions. I believe there is a great future before this African Lakes Company, and that it is linked with the destinies of Africa."

It is a grand idea to keep out of this region the vices of civilization, and with honest purpose teach these children of the soil a true civilization.—Christian Statesman.

THE DYING DAUGHTER.

During the funeral services of the late John S. Inskip, a minister from New Jersey named Ballard gave the following account. He was some time before conducting a camp-meeting in New Jersey when he received a telegram from his wife stating that his daughter was dying, and requesting him to come immediately home. He started to take the train, when brother Inskip said, "Don't go yet—let us pray."

The whole congregation bowed before God in prayer, Mr. Inskip pouring out his heart's desire in mighty supplications for the life of the daughter. It was a time of solemn and awful power, and the assurance was granted that God had heard and answered the petition.

Mr. Ballard then started for home; arrived there at six o'clock, and met his wife who remarked that something very strange had occurred. At four o'clock the daughter seemed to be in the agonies of death—instantly there came a change—she was relieved, and was now getting better. The doctors said:

"We do not understand this. At four o'clock your daughter was dying; when suddenly there came a change, and she is now recovering."

No wonder it was a mystery to them; but to him it was all plain.

"The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him;" and to such this power of faith and prayer, and the wonder-working might of God are not strange. They have known too many answers to their prayers to be surprised at such manifestations as this.—Sel.

BIBLE READINGS FOR THE YOUNG.

FRUIT-BEARING. Read John 15: 1–16.

Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me. John 15: 4.

1. What is it to abide in Christ? John 14: 23; 10: 27.
2. What is done with a branch that is cut off from the vine? John 15: 6; Ezek. 15: 4.
3. What becomes of professors who are not joined to Christ? Matt. 7: 22, 23; 15: 13.
4. How are believers enabled to bear much fruit? Gal. 2: 20; Phil. 4: 13; Hos. 14: 8.
5. What is the first step towards bearing fruit? 2 Cor. 8: 5.—Notes for Bible Study.

THE LIGHT THAT IS FELT.

A tender child of summers three,
Seeking her little bed at night,
Paused on the dark stair timidly,
"Oh, mother! Take my hand," said she,
"And then the dark will all be light."

We older children grope our way
From dark behind to dark before;
And only when our hands we lay,
Dear Lord, in Thine, the night is day,
And there is darkness nevermore.

Reach downward to the sunless days
Wherein our guides are blind as we,
And faith is small and hope delays;
Take Thou the hands of prayer we raise,
And let us feel the light of Thee!

A TALK ABOUT LONDON.

All eyes are now turned toward the great English metropolis on account of the frequent explosions of dynamite in public places by the agents of secret societies. "Cousin Daisy," a writer in the Pansy, gives a very entertaining account of this greatest city in the world, which all little readers will enjoy:

We were sitting at the window of the Charing Cross hotel. Fourteen-year-old Jessie, who is heartily enjoying her first long journey had been in a constant state of surprise and delight at something or other since our arrival in London, two days ago, and was now helping on my letter writing by calling my attention every minute to some object that interested her in the busy street below. Now it was a grenadier guard with his tall fur head-gear, looking as if he wore a muff for a hat; not a dainty, tiny muff such as ladies carry now, but a large one such as our grandmothers used, into which you could thrust your arms nearly up to the elbow. Before I am settled again after a rush to the window to look at the guard, Jessie calls me once more to see a bevy of bootblacks in their bright scarlet coats, and next moment she cries, "O, Cousin Daisy, do come and look at this street car. There are two rows of seats on the roof, and the funniest winding stairease leading up to them." Having made a blot, crossed two l's, and written cheese instead of choose in the general confusion, I tell the chatterbox Jessie that, not even to see a witch ride past on a broomstick, will I be persuaded or surprised into another journey to the window, and I turn my attention once more to letter-writing.

"Now, Cousin Daisy dear, do please come to the window, just this once more, and tell me what this is. Oh, it looks to be coming down the street!"

The object of Jessie's is certainly curious enough to interest any one unused to London or London weather.

It is like a dingy yellow cloud, not in the heavens where clouds belong, but stealing along, gliding along over the pavement and the cobble stones far up the street!

As it comes nearer, it seems to swallow up everything in its path, and in a very short time houses and spires, horses, coaches and cars, pavement, foot passengers and all have disappeared, all wrapped around in a yellow brown mist—the famous London fog! Except for the noise in the street below, we might fancy ourselves sailing through the clouds in a balloon. In the hotel it is dark as night, and everybody tumbles about the halls in a forlorn manner, till the landlady takes pity on us and lights the gas. By gaslight we dine, and but for the sober old clock which looks as if, like Washington, it could not lie, and which tells us it it just two, I should think we had suddenly become very fashionable and were sitting down to eight o'clock dinner.

In the street, all the cabs, cars and stages light their lamps, and a dull gleam through the fog shows that they are coming. Drivers of carts and carriages walk at their horses' heads shouting as they go, or holding lighted lanterns or flaming links, to give warning of their approach.

Steamers and tugs on the Thames hoot and whistle so there is a great noise everywhere. These dense fogs come up from the North Sea, and occur through the late fall, winter, and early spring, but are most frequent in the month of November. They hang over the city for hours at a time, until a land breeze springs up in the west, tears the clouds to shreds, and sends them rolling back to the ocean whence they came. In the country the mist is white, but in the city it mixes with all the smoke from all the chimneys, and it is this smoke which gives to London fog its dirty, yellow look. We Philadelphians or New Yorkers are apt to grumble about the keen frosts, the heavy snows and the biting winds of our winter, but few of us, I think, would be willing to exchange our clear, cold days for the dismal foggy ones which visit our London cousins.

As this present fog has ended all hopes and plans of sight-seeing, perhaps I cannot spend time better than in telling our young friends over the water something about this great city and its wonders.

London is built on both sides of the river Thames, and many bridges, crossing the river, join the two parts of the city together. One of the longest, widest, and handsomest of these is London Bridge. A great crowd is always crossing on it: generally going to business, sailors, soldiers, newsboys, bootblacks, and cabs, cars, carriages, and drays in a constant stream. In olden times, the heads of persons who had been put to death for treason, were sometimes fixed on spears or poles and set up on this bridge as a public warning.

But these are dismal reflections. It is pleasanter to think of the sights that were seen here one bright morning, when all London welcomed Alexandra, the beautiful young Danish princess, who came to England as the bride of the queen's eldest son, Prince Albert.

All the bells of the city were ringing, cannons were fired, and flags were flying everywhere. The factories and mills were closed, the workers in them had a holiday, and the streets were crowded with people all dressed in their best.

At the sides of London Bridge are little projecting balconies, or recesses, and these are filled with plants and flowers. Along the middle of the bridge scarlet cloth was spread, and along the sides stood long rows of soldiers in bright scarlet coats, and wearing gold or silver-colored helmets.

When the Prince and Princess drove by in an open carriage, the military bands struck up, the ladies waved their handkerchiefs, and all the people cheered till they were hoarse. Among the crowd were a company of brewers, big, red-faced men in large, coarse aprons, such as English working men sometimes wear. How they shouted, to be sure. "Lord love her pretty face," one of them said, "don't I wish I was the Prince of Wales!"

This princess has been as good and sweet as she is beautiful, and is tenderly loved in England to-day.

In olden times London was surrounded by a wall, and people entered the city through gates. As the city grew and spread out on all sides, the old walls and gates were sadly in the way, and they have been one by one pulled down. Their names remain to mark the places where they have stood, and there are localities called Alder-gate, Cripple-gate and Ludgate.

The last of these old gates was a stone archway called Temple Bar. It stood across Fleet street, which is the Broadway of London, and the cabs, stages, carriages and carts with which the road is always crowded, found great difficulty and delay in passing through such a narrow place. The mortar which held the stones together, was crumbling away with age, and there was danger of the stones falling on the heads of the people and horses below.

For a while the poor old gate was propped up by great beams of wood, but Londoners soon found that they would have to bid it good-by altogether, and about two years ago it was pulled down.

Temple Bar is famous on account of being the gate by which the kings and queens entered London.

And the king, though monarch of England and Ireland, Scotland and Wales, was obliged to send his herald to knock at the gate and ask the Lord Mayor's permission to enter the city. This custom was intended to show that the Lord Mayor within the city had more power than the king himself, for the mayor of London during his year of office is one of the greatest and most powerful men in England.

When Queen Victoria first came to Temple Bar the people were so anxious to give a warm welcome to their sweet young queen, that they never even let her knock, but had the gate opened wide, ready to receive her.

Strangers in London will find much amusement in noticing the names of the streets and squares which in the East End, or old part of the city, are very queer.

Amidst Fish hill, Bread street, Shad street, Milk street, Pudding lane, and Pie corner it ought to be impossible to die of starvation.

Sad lane, Maiden Lane, Kissin' lane and Matrimony lane suggests a little romance.

Worship square, Paternoster row, Angel street and Ave Maria lane have a religious sound.

Mad Ox street does not sound inviting, and Bull and Mouth street seem to me the oddest of all this curious list.

Some names, like Bowery, in New York, were given when the busy streets were fresh and green country and are most unsuitable now.

I once heard of an English lady visiting New York, who heard of the "Bowery," and thought it must be a beautiful shady park. So, she put up lunch, took her children, hired a carriage, and went down there intending to picnic and spend the day.

When the driver took her to a hot, bustling street lined with common looking stores, she was much surprised and disappointed.

Brook Farm Hill, and St. Giles fields in London are quite as misleading names, and if you could go to St. Paul's Churchyard, instead of seeing the green grass, the flowers, and the peaceful graves that the name would lead you to expect, you would find yourself in a busy, narrow street where are numbers of shops, with windows full of flowers, laces, ribbons, bonnets, and dress goods, and crowds of ladies busily buying all sorts of pretty things.

TEMPERANCE.

FOOT-PRINTS OF THE TRAFFIC.

On Friday night at New Madison, O., Simon Burnes drank a glass of beer in a saloon and started for his home. He was found on the roadside next morning, dead. Poison in the glass. On the same day John Wilt went into a saloon in the same town, and was clubbed to death. New Madison is in Darke county.

Two brothers, Lewis and Harvey Priest, became intoxicated at Delaware on Wednesday, and while returning to their home, they were struck by the night express on the C. & T. railroad, and literally ground to pieces. Their mutilated remains were gathered up the next morning.

The wife of Colonel Trevelyan, a member of one of the proudest and most illustrious English families, has sunk into the lowest depths of vice, poverty and disgrace through drunkenness. Her appetite for liquor became uncontrollable, and on several occasions after her marriage she openly indulged it to excess. Her husband's expostulations were in vain. A separation was agreed upon, by which the wayward woman should have £300 yearly. After the separation was effected, she went rapidly downward. For some time she has been constantly confined in workhouses and jails for petty offences. It is thought that she is irreclaimable.

Hiram Price, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, recently remarked: "There are 200,000 inhabitants in Washington, which is the capital of this great Nation and the central point of its refinement and culture, and yet there is more drunkenness and crime here than among the 250,000 Indians who are savages, and have never felt the elevating influence of our modern civilization."

A DOCTOR'S STORY.

"You know nothing about intemperance," said a noted physician. "I could write volumes that would amaze you."

"Write one," I said.

"It would be a breach of honor. A physician, like a Romish priest, may not betray the confessional." After a moment he added: "Our profession takes us into homes. And lives and hearts that seem all bright and happy are often dark and miserable from sickness of the soul."

"There must be some scenes that it would be proper for you to tell me," I urged; "please think of some."

"I was called to the wife of a distinguished gentleman. Her husband sat by her bed fanning her, a lovely bouquet of flowers was on the stand by her side. Two little girls were playing quietly in the room. It was a charming picture of love and devotion."

"'My wife fell down stairs,' said her husband, 'and I fear has hurt herself seriously.'

"I examined her shoulder. It was swollen and almost black, and one rib was broken."

"'How do you find her?' asked her husband anxiously.

"I will ask the questions, if you please. How did you so injure yourself?'

"'I fell on the stairway.'

"'I hesitated. I was not in a paddy shanty, but in the house of a well-known and unstained man. I re-examined her side.

"'When did she fall?' I asked.

"'Last night,' he said, after a second's pause and a glance at her.

"My resolve was taken.

"'Please show me the place on the stairs where she struck?' I said to the husband, rising and going out. He followed me.

"'I was not with her when she fell,' he said.

"'The injury was not from a fall, and it was not done last night. Never try to deceive a doctor.'

"' She begged me not to tell you the truth.'

"'Then get another physician,' I said.

"'I will tell you the whole truth. Night before last I had been out to dinner.'

"'I saw your brilliant speech in the paper. Was it wine-inspired?'

"'Partly. Most after-dinner speeches are to a degree. I came home excited by the fine dinner, wit, wisdom, and wine of the evening, and went, not to bed, but to the closet and drank heavily. My wife heard me and came down, hoping to coax me up stairs, as she had done many times. But she was too late. My reason and manhood were gone and I pounded her, and left her. She tried to follow me, but fell on the stairs. After a time she crawled, she says, up stairs, and went into the nursery and slept with the little girls. I slept late, and woke with a fierce headache, and went out at once, thinking no breakfast and the out-door air would clear my brain for my morning engagements. I pledge you my honor I had forgotten I struck my wife. When I came back last night I found her suffering; but she would not permit a physician should be sent for lest it should disgrace me. I think she really tries to believe that she hurt herself, more or less, when she fell.' And with an honest quiver of the chin he added, 'She is an angel, and wine is a devil.'

"'What are wine-bibbers?'

"'Own children of their father. Is my wife seriously hurt?'

"'I cannot tell yet. I fear she is.'

"More absolute, untiring devotion no man ever gave a wife than he gave her while she lived and suffered. When her noble, true, loving heart ceased to throb he was inconsolable. His love and devotion were the theme of every lip, and the Providence that so afflicted him was called 'strange' in a tone of semi-censure! On her tomb is cut the 'beloved wife!' He has gone to her now, in that land of no license.

"No one but myself ever knew the truth."—National Temp. Advocate.

LITERATURE.

History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella. By William H. Prescott. In two volumes. Illustrated. Pp 495 and 502. John B. Alden, New York.

Among American historians the name of Prescott must ever stand in the first rank, not only for the elegance of his diction and the intrinsic value of his contributions but also for the example of a noble assiduity amid crushing infirmities. He had early made a profound study of Spanish history and literature, and had collected the materials for the History of Ferdinand and Isabella, when his sight failed, and he pursued his future studies, and wrote histories of the Conquest of Mexico and the Conquest of Peru, and nearly completed that of Philip II., with the burden of this great misfortune upon him. This work has been too long before the American readers to need commendation. As a history of Spain in her time of glory and conquest the language has nothing superior, if equal. The publisher has issued two beautiful volumes at a rate little more than one-half the usual price.

The Century's success in reproducing a partial history of the rebellion in sketches of its famous battles, is unprecedented. The first edition of the February number numbered 180,000; the second, 20,000. Though this mid-winter number presents a strong list of writers, it will hardly prove of such permanent value as some that have been lately issued. The novels of Henry James and W. D. Howells occupy many pages, and the latter writes a descriptive paper on Florence. "Canada as a Winter Resort" is finely illustrated. But the popular feature is Gen. Grant's paper on the battle of Shiloh, followed by an account from the other side by a son of General Johnston, the rebel leader. Gen. Grant had not at this time reached his zenith as is evident from his apologetic style. It is probably not due to his generalship that day that his whole force was not captured. Col. Johnston's brilliant pen almost captivates the sympathies of the reader for the wrong side, and though strongly colored with his Southern enthusiasm, makes us admire the energy and ability which nearly overpowered the Union forces. The maps and illustrations of the battle-field make a vivid impression of its bloody scenes.

THE CHURCHES.

—The General Assembly of the United Presbyterian church will be held in Topeka, Kan., beginning May 27.

—Mr. Moody will begin a three day's service in Newark, Feb. 17th; From Newark he will go to Fort Wayne, Ind.

—The Rev. S. M. Newman, of Ripon, Wis., will, it is understood, accept the call to the First Congregational church at Washington, D. C.

—The Associate Reform Synod of the South reports the following statistics: Total number of members, 6,727; total amount of salaries paid, $38,909.16; total amount of contributions, including Seminary Endowment, $64,851.76; contributions per capita $9.59.

—Rev. J. A. Magill, the telegraph reports, was recently stopped by two unknown men near his home in Juniata county, Pa., and informed by them that if he did not quit preaching temperance as he had been preaching it, he "might expect to move suddenly before long." With that his horse's bridle was let go and he was permitted to proceed to his destination.

—Mr. Bliss, the Boston evangelist, concluded his labors at Chicago Avenue church, Jan. 18th. Rev. C. F. Goss, late of the Bethany Presbyterian church of Utica, N. Y., has accepted a call to the Chicago Avenue church and has already arrived in the city to commence his pastoral labors.

—The Colorado Congregational College is reported as in great embarassment financially, and in danger of being crippled in its usefulness, or even, possibly, of being utterly ruined.

—Some of the best men of New York City have started a movement to help the most degraded children of the city, children of depraved parents, and those who know nothing of father and mother. The first object is to help the child in its home. Day shelters and night schools will be established for these children, but no child will be accepted within twenty-four hours after application has been made, in order to find the actual condition of the environment of the applicant.

—The Christian convention at Scranton, Pa., presided over by D. L. Moody, closed last Tuesday evening. The meetings were held in the rink, and each of them was attended by fully 5,000 persons. During the convention $35,000 have been subscribed by the citizens of that place to the building fund of the Young Men's Christian Association of Scranton.

—An incident which seriously agitated the Bishop of London, and it is believed hastened his death, occurred in St. Paul's Cathedral while he was preaching the previous Sunday evening. During a momentary pause in the discourse a wild-looking individual jumped from a chair, and, pointing his finger toward the pulpit, yelled, "You worship idols while you scorn to save souls. Woe unto you!" He was soon removed, and was sent to jail for two months.

—A dispatch from Gallipolis, Ohio, says that the most remarkable revival of religion ever known in that old French city is now in progress. Nearly 1,000 conversions are reported, and many saloons are closed. All the inmates of two disreputable houses have joined the church. All classes are reached. Business is largely suspended, and the same influence is felt throughout the entire section.

—The Rev. Dr. Torrence, of the Pennsylvania Bible Society, says that the Scriptures are circulated in the "Keystone" State in twenty-two languages, while not less than sixty languages and dialects are spoken in in the old commonwealth.

—The late Governor Coburn, of Maine, has left legacies to Baptist educational and religious interests to the amount of nearly $700,000. He was for thirty-nine years a trustee of Colby University, and gives to this college $200,000. The American Baptist Home Missionary Socicty gets $200,000; The American Baptist Missionary Union, $100,000; Maine Baptist Missionary Convention, $100,000; Wayland Seminary, Washington, D. C., $50,000: Houlton Academy, $5,000; Skowhegan Baptist church, $18,000, and the Coburn Classical Institute, $100,000.

—The American Bible Society has published for distribution at the New Orleans Exposition, a pamphlet containing specimen verses in all the languages and dialects in which the Holy Scriptures have been printed by the American Bible Society and the British and Foreign Bible Society, numbering 242. It is a very interesting souvenir as well as a suggestive indication of the wide circulation of the Word of God.

—The annual meeting of the Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian church, Brooklyn, Rev. T. L. Cuyler, pastor, was held on the 14th inst. It is stated that the present membership of the church is 1,960. The benevolent contributions during the past year amounted to $17,780. The Sabbath-schools of the church number 1,350 scholars and teachers. During the last year the demand for pews has been greater than any previous time in the history of the church. The devotional meetings have been largely attended. On the first Sabbath of April, Dr. Cuyler will complete twenty-five years of his ministry as pastor of this flourishing church.

A NEATLY PRINTED SIXTEEN PAGE WEEKLY JOURNAL, UNSECTARIAN AND OPPOSED TO SECRET SOCIETIES.

THE POLE STAR OF REFORM.

EVERY Christian, every Prohibitionist and every Patriot should read it for the following among other reasons:

1. Because it meets the wants of the general public by giving in brief the latest reliable information on all questions of Reform, having the special object of exposing and opposing organized secrecy. Besides able editorial, contributed and selected articles upon this topic, which is of more than national importance, it has interesting sketches of progress and incidents from the reform lecturers in all parts of the country, reform news and notes, letters from the Old World, etc., etc. It is the especial organ of this movement in America—a movement which is sustained by the utterances of some of the ablest statesmen and divines whom the country has produced. Every person interested in either the family, government, or religion—the most sacred interests of humanity—is directly affected by secret societies, and needs to keep posted in this movement.

2. Because it is uncompromising on ALL questions of the day. On temperance, tobacco, Sabbath desecration, Mormonism, the Southern and Indian questions, civil-service reform, monopolies, the rights of labor, and every other question, its only aim is to be RIGHT, and advocate the TRUTH. It is hence FEARLESS and OUTSPOKEN.

3. Because it emphasizes the fact that political action should be directed by conscience enlightened by the WORD and SPIRIT of God and that Christ must be acknowledged KING of NATIONS, and presents a platform epitomizing the science of civil governments based on the supreme authority of the DIVINE WORD.

4. Because, in addition to these features, it contains a choice selection of wholesome reading for the family, from oldest to youngest, with religious and secular news, market reports, etc.

SEVEN GREAT MONARCHIES

The SEVEN GREAT MONARCHIES of the Ancient Eastern World: Chaldea; Assyria; Babylon; Media; Persia; Parthia, and the New Persian Empire. By GEORGE RAWLINSON, M. A. In three large 12mo. volumes, of over 2,000 pages, large type, leaded. With all the notes and a greatly improved index, also with the profuse fine illustrations (over 700) and maps of the English edition. Price per set, in fine cloth, gilt tops, reduced from $18 to $3.00. Postage 48 cents.

"The books, as books, are EXCELLENT. Paper, type, presswork, illustrations, and binding are all good, and the price extraordinarily low."—Literary World, Boston.

"These books are a MARVEL of CHEAPNESS and excellence. We know of no other work of similar value and extent that is sold in this or any other market for anything like so low a price."—Examiner, N. Y.

"A MASTERPIECE of history. The reader almost feels that the author has walked hand in hand with the heroes of almost prehistoric periods, so familiar is he with the facts of olden times. When he describes an Assyrian sunset, or a Chaldean home, the reader is led to forget the long centuries that separate these scenes from modern times. The deepest antiquity is imbued with the freshness of a bright and living present, full of realities, shrouded in the gloom of defeat, or made radiant with the glories of some Babylonian king. Remoteness of the times treated of has not obscured the author's work, but has invested it with the elements of romance. When he brings the bloom of health to the cheeks of those who perished 2,400 years before Christ, and analyzes character, describes cities, pictures battles, and sanctions all with the matchless accuracy of a vast erudition, his book leaves a telling impression on the mind. His reserved knowledge is wonderful, and substantiates the main narrative in excellent annotations and accurate references to orignal sources of imformation. It is the greatest historical work of the times."—Times, Kansas City, Mo.

"It abounds in ARTISTIC and SCHOLARLY details. It contains the studies of a learned lifetime, and the faithful student will rise from its perusal with a mind enriched by a more vivid knowledge of that ancient world whose mysteries the race of scholars has been endeavoring to elucidate."—Mail, Toronto.

"This is a new and marvelously cheap edition of a standard work. It is one of a series of historical works Mr. Alden is publishing, in which he seems to have discovered or invented the art of combining standard literature, good type, tasty and strong binding, numerous illustrations, with the lowest prices. Mr. Alden certainly leads the cheap book movement at present. We do not know of any book that can supply the place of Rawlinson."—Christian Advocate, Buffalo, N. Y.

Sign for the Honor of Washington.

The Washington Monument is to be dedicated February 22, 1885, and the rites of the Masonic Lodge—though once excluded—are to be performed by permission of the Congressional Committee, because, it is said, the corner stone was laid by the order. This distinction should never be given, because:—

1. Two wrongs do not make one right.
2. The monument is National, built with the Nation's money. Its dedication is a National event, and should be National and American, not the affair of a sect, secret or open.
3. The Masonic Lodge has no more right to such distinction than the Hibernians, or any other secret order; or than the Episcopalian, Presbyterian, or any other ecclesiastical society.
4. The stone sent by the Pope for the monument was broken up and thrown into the Potomac without explanation or word of regret. Why are the Catholics snubbed, and the Freemasons honored?
5. Freemasonry is of foreign birth, entirely un-American and unrepublican. Its public displays are pompous and barbaric. Its titles are extravagant and lordly. Its constitution is despotic. Its oaths are extra-judicial, which Webster said should be suppressed by law.
6. Freemasons claim Washington as a member; but he left them in 1768, while yet a young man; never presided in the lodge, and did not wish to be addressed even as a private Mason. This is proved by his letters and the records of the Pennsylvania Legislature of 1837. In his Farewell Address he speaks of organizations which exhibit the character of Freemasonry as destructive of the fundamental principle of liberty, and "of fatal tendency," "likely in the course of time and things to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious and unprincipled men will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reigns of government."

Remonstrance.

To HON. JOHN SHERMAN, Chairman of Congressional Committee on Washington Monument:

The undersigned respectfully protest against the arrangement granting the performance of Masonic rites at the dedication of the Washington Monument, and pray that your Committee will allow only such ceremonies as are National in their scope and American in their character.

HOME HINTS.

THE SNOW CURE.

From an illustrated paper by W. Geo. Beers, on "Canada as a Winter Resort," in the February Century, we quote the following: It is by no means every delicate person who should make Canada his winter resort; but it is well known that our winters have cured chronic cases for which Colorado and Florida were alone supposed to be beneficial. Every winter numbers resort to Montreal, Quebec, Halifax and Winnipeg for no other reason than that for which they once went to tropical climates. I know of patients who were regularly sent to Bermuda and the West Indies, and others to such winter climates as Nice, without more than temporary benefit, who were completely cured by the outdoor life of our Montreal and Quebec winters. Two year ago we had an exceptionally severe winter in Manitoba. Its severity and peculiarities were precisely the same in Dakota and Minnesota. I was enroute from Brandon to Winnipeg, a distance of 180 miles by rail, and was caught in a snow blockade which lasted eight days, and kept us in a situation not likely again to occur. The storm was so severe that relief trains could not leave Winnipeg, and a couple of us who had the long snow-shoes used on the prairies tramped to and from farm houses a couple of miles distant for provisions for the passengers. The snow-plows were of no use, and in a desperate attempt to cut a way through the drifts, the engine jumped the track and came to grief. The train was pulled back from the debris by an engine in the rear and the next morning we found ourselves separated from the wreck by deep drifts, some of them fifteen feet high. Night after night passed; the coal and wood ran short; two of the cars were abandoned by the passengers, and, to economize fuel, we were crowded into the two remaining cars. The sleeping accommodation improvised was very amusing. Fancy roosting two in a single seat, with your knees doubled up to your chin, or lying like sardines, four in a double seat; or propped on top of the back of the seats, which were turned up and brought together so as to form a sort of double deck. Shovelers had been working day and night, but there were too few of them; and at last the passengers went to work, and from 9 A. M. until 5 P. M. pitched the snow with might and main, and succeeded in clearing the track. In order to pass the obstacle of the wrecked engine, we raised old rails, got ties and laid a new side-track on the hard snow, and our cars were safely shoved forward. Shovelers from Winnipeg had succeeded, with the snow plow, in reaching us, and we were soon on our way. The effect of this exposure upon the health of many of the passengers was remarkably good. One clergyman who had come out from England for some affection of the throat, was determined to do his share of the shoveling. He had very thin moccasins on his feet and during the day, as there was a warm wind they were wet through. He never expected to see England again, but that one day's work cured him effectually. Other persons suffering from throat and lung affections have not since been troubled. One would suppose the conditions were just those to provoke illness, but very reverse was the case."

TOO MUCH QUININE DANGEROUS.

Medical humbugs are not confined to the secret preparations so extravagantly advertised. It would be well if the law prevented prescribing by any one who is not a medical man. It is a popular notion that one who claims to teach some subjects, is capable of giving advice in others. We sometimes find clergymen prescribing for their parishioners, and editors going out of their sphere, if they have one, and advising their readers to use the same doses which they think they have found useful in their shattered systems. Recently the promiscuous and continuous taking of small doses of quinine has been advised. Many are aware how seriously large doses of quinine affect the brain; disturbed hearing and sight, incoherent speech and other symptoms of intoxication being present. In small and repeated doses the "quinine habit" is confirmed, the brain is affected, and obliquity of moral as well as real vision may result. We have seen habitual takers of quinine who had lost the ability to distinguish right from wrong, or the difference between their own and other people's property, whose speech uttered falsehood more readily than truth, and whose whole conduct appeared to be under the influence of too much quinine. Always avoid indiscriminate dosing.—American Agriculturist.

"A WEEKLY SHOWER OF REFRESHING."

Such is the language of a minister in writing of the

OF

New York.

—)o-o(—

Read some of the many high opinions of the CHRISTIAN NATION expressed by people and papers:

The True Radical Ring.

I like your paper. It has the true radical ring, and is growing better every week.
(REV.) T. C. SPROULL.

A Weekly Treat.

I have enjoyed a weekly treat, as the CHRISTIAN NATION is just to my taste. I like the fearless stand that it has taken for Prohibition. H. M. POLLOCK.

Par Excellence.

Allow me to congratulate you on the appearance and make-up of your paper. The matter is very good, and in fact the whole is par excellence. I hope you may receive many thousands of subscribers. S. O. LOWRY.

In the Front Rank.

I congratulate you most heartily upon the success which has thus far attended your enterprise, and wish you the largest measure of success in the future. This undoubtedly you will have, and simply because of the merits of your paper, which already holds its place among our best religious Journals, and has put itself abreast of the advanced movements in journalism. (REV.) J. F. CARSON.

Hold the Fort for Prohibition.

I am very much pleased with your paper. It is not a yearling, but I hope that it may be, like England's queen of old, hale and hearty at sixty—that it may live to see this nation a Christian Nation indeed and in truth. Hold the fort for Prohibition! Some of us have had to pass through the fire of persecution because we dared to vote our sentiments on that question, and your paper has been a weekly shower of refreshing to us. May it prove a blessing in this, and be a great power in the work of overturning the greatest evil that ever cursed our nation, and which does more than any other agent in hindering us from becoming a Christian Nation. (REV.) A. H. ORR.

The Facts Stated.

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt. William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribes his NAME to the letter, but ATTACHES HIS AFFIDAVIT to it.

In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of "secret societies."

The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

HOLDEN WITH CORDS,

OR THE POWER OF THE SECRET EMPIRE. A faithful representation in story of the evil influence of Freemasonry, by E. E. FLAGG, author of "Little People," "A Sunny Life," etc. This is a thrillingly interesting story, accurately true to life because mainly a narration of historical facts. 384 pages. In cloth, $1; per doz., $9. Paper, 50c; per doz., $4.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"There is no important history extant but has connected with it numerous other histories of which it was the initial point, or the dominating influence. The abduction and murder of Morgan set ten thousand secret springs in motion, as the surrender of the charters of so many lodges at that time, and the severing of their connection with the order of some forty thousand of its members indicated. This story is one of these histories, and is a collection of facts woven into a story. It cannot fail to be read with interest."—Free Methodist, Chicago.

"The republication of the Reform Story which run through the columns of the Cynosure for nearly a year is at last completed, and the book so anxiously expected by thousands of our readers has come from the press of Ezra A. Cook. The book is finely bound and fairly introduces the reader to the treasures within. The publisher has made occasional selections from Masonic works to verify the statements of the text; these make a helpful addition for some who can afford no more complete an armory of this kind."—Christian Cynosure.

"It is one of the most fascinating narratives we ever read and teaches its lesson in a manner not soon to be forgotten. It is evidently written for the heart and its words go to the heart. It is singularly free from wild denunciation. Those who are interested in the secret society question would do well to form the acquaintance of this interesting work."—Lutheran Standard, Columbus, O.

"The exciting scenes of the fall of 1826, at Batavia, N. Y., when Wm. Morgan was murdered by Masonry, are woven into the story so as to give the truth of History a setting of attractiveness The forty chapters of the volume are soon compassed by the eager reader who begins the volume. This volume ought to be read and will be sought as its merits become known."—United Brethren in Christ.

"The story is intensely interesting and the author has succeeded in weaving into it a great deal of information in regard to this mysterious order, which is certainly startling if true, and he gives what seems to be undoubted evidence to prove his assertions. The book is one which should be read by both Masons and Antimasons."—Wayne Co. Herald.

"Our Anti-secret society friends are certainly entitled to great credit for their persistence in their efforts to expose and root out secretism. The object of the writer of this story is to present in its true light the crafty, unscrupulous and exceedingly hurtful influence of Masonry, the parent of all the orders."—Reformed Presbyterian and Covenanter.

IN BRIEF.

We have the word of the pauper authorities of Paris for it that they shall have to support or aid 406,000 persons the coming year, at a cost of $8,000,000.

In the latter years of his life the Rev. Rowland Hill used to come to his chapel in a carriage. He got an anonymous letter rebuking him for this, because it was not the way his Heavenly Master traveled. He read the letter from the pulpit and said it was quite true, and that if the writer would come to the vestry with a saddle and bridle, he would ride him home.

The smallest steam engine in the world is now claimed by the Toronto Globe to be the production of a resident of Arkona, Ont. It says the dimensions of this diminutive affair are as follows: Diameter of cylinder, ⅛ of 1-16 of a inch; stroke 1-32 of an inch; weight ⅛ of a grain; bore of cylinder, .3125 of a square inch; revolution .1760 per minute; horse power, .12490 part of a horse power. This engine is so small that it can easily be covered with the case of a 22-caliber cartridge.

Mr. Moody made a visit recently to Canada. The Presbyterian, in an appreciative notice, warns the younger brethren against imitating him and offers the following as supporting its gentle caution: "Punshon, as some of our readers may remember, had a habit of laying his left hand on his breast, pretty low down, when he rose to speak. A good brother caught the idea, and when he rose to speak he always paused for a moment and laid his open palm carefully over the pit of his stomach and then went on. It was the only thing that Punshon did that he could do."—Ex.

Mr. Gladstone is a prowler. He loves back streets. It is no unusual thing to see him looking in at the window of a bric-a-brac store. On summer days he often strolls from Parliament to his home in Harley street, an interested spectator of all that goes on around him. He is not well dressed. His trousers are generally baggy at the knees. His tall collars are always familiar in caricatures. He rarely buys a new hat. He has a strong, hard, bony face, a powerful forehead, a characteristic nose, a firm mouth (a little hard in its lines). Mr. Gladstone would strike the most ordinary observer as a man of great intellectual physique.—Ex.

During the past year the agricultural bureau sent out, in round numbers, 3,600,000 packages of seeds, and of these 2,900,000 were sent out by Congressmen. This represents a package of seeds to every two families in the country and those persons who did not get packages last year should apply for one this year. Of these parcels 2,300,000 were vegetables, 500,000 of flowers, 114,000 of tobacco, 69,000 of wheat, 200,000 of corn, 425,000 of turnips, 12,000 of potatoes, and only one package of rye. The salaries of the agricultural department footed up over $127,000 and the above seeds cost $75,000.—Cleveland Leader.

The Baltimore Manufacturers' Record, in its annual review of Southern industries, publishes a list of all the manufacturing and mining enterprises organized in the Southern States in 1884. It shows 1,865 new enterprises, with an aggregate capital reaching the enormous sum of $105,269,000, divided among the fourteen States as follows: Alabama, 187 new establishments, capital, $16,925,000; Arkansas, 46, with capital of $2,040,000; Florida, 95, and $2,323,000 capital; Georgia, 196, capital $5,455,000; Kentucky, 137, capital $21,762,000; Louisiana, 53, capital $5,534,000; Maryland, 105, capital $7,121,500; Mississippi, 40, capital $1 295,000; North Carolina, 226, capital $4,110,000; South Carolina, 53, capital $2,154,000; Tennessee, 250, capital $7,910,000; Texas, 212, capital $10,778,000; Virginia, 188, capital $13,450,000; West Virginia, 77, capital $4,392,000 In Kentucky, Alabama and Virginia, extensive mining and iron companies having large capital were organized, running up the total investment in those States, though they also added many of the smaller industries. The list shows almost every branch of general manufacture represented. A noticeable feature is the amount of Northern and Western capital going into the South, though the Southern people are themselves showing remarkable energy in developing their resources.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

WASHINGTON.

Congressmen were surprised, Monday, to see sparks falling from the roof of the House of Representatives, and, with the pages and officers, rushed for the exits, in anticipation of an explosion. The fire had broken out in a narrow room next the roof and was extinguished after some delay, and fortunately some important records and documents were found to be uninjured. The fire is supposed to have been caused by the electric light wires.

The Nicaragua treaty failed to receive the needed two-thirds vote last Thursday, and notwithstanding a motion to reconsider, entered by Senator Edmunds, it is regarded as dead for the present session at least.

Congressman Rosecrane's son is a Catholic priest and his two daughters are nuns.

A petition was presented to the Senate Friday from Amos Lawrence, James Freeman Clark, W. W. Higginson, Edward Everett Hale, Professor Peabody, and others, for incorporation to do a land business. Their plan is to settle Utah with farmers. They will buy and sell lands, aiming only to shift the surplus population of New England to the fertile valleys of Utah, hoping in time to outnumber the Mormons on their own ground.

The postoffice appropriation bill, as completed by the House appropriation committee, provides a total appropriation of $52,253,200, against $49,040,400 last year, and $56,009,169 asked for by the postoffice department.

COUNTRY.

New York was greatly excited by an attempt made during Saturday night to blow up the dry-goods store of Garry Bros. by the use of dynamite. The premises were damaged to the extent of $2,500. The police believe the explosion the outcome of the strike of Garry Brothers' employes, who are members of the Dry-Goods Union, and have recently tried many methods to secure their reinstatement, without success. Four men were arrested on suspicion.

The liberty bell was accorded a hearty reception Monday at New Orleans, salutes being fired and the streets and shipping decorated. At Beauvoir, Miss., Jeff Davis met the train bearing the famous relic and made a short speech, expressing sentiments in favor of accepting the results of the war stronger than have ever before come from his lips.

Three explosions of natural gas almost simultaneously, at Pittsburg, Saturday forenoon, wrecked three houses, damaged others, and broke all the windows in the vicinity. Eighteen persons were wounded, seven of whom are not expected to recover, and one woman is missing. Threats are being made to tear up the pipes of the gas fuel company, and suits for damages will be instituted.

A sleigh containing nine persons, who were returning from a ball, was struck by a train near Port Clinton, Ohio, early Saturday morning. Three were killed and three others fatally injured.

FOREIGN.

Numerous threats have been made to blow up the Hollyhead railway terminus and hotel, and Brittania tubular bridge and Menai supension bridge, over Menai Strait. American tourists will be interested, as this is one of their favorite routes. Precautionary measures are being taken by the detectives. Irish National League meetings in Ireland have passed resolutions denouncing the dynamite plots.

BUSINESS.

Notwithstanding we have passed thro' months of bitter political strife and have also lost some old friends who have preferred some one of the lower priced papers which now light up the moral and political heavens, to the Cynosure, yet we are happy to announce to our friends that the Cynosure had a larger list of subscribers by 345 upon Jan. 1, 1885, than it had June 1, 1884; and that there are 115 more whose subscriptions are paid in advance than there were at the beginning of our financial year last June.

Rev. H. S. Boyd writes: "I read your paper and then hand it to my neighbors. Perhaps after a while some of them will subscribe. I think we need the Cynosure. I enclose you five dollars." Whenever a friend sends five or ten dollars to renew his subscription, he is not only saved the trouble of renewing every year but donates to the reform work what it costs to send out renewal notices and other appeals, which amounts to a good many dollars at the end of the year, when the small amounts are summarized.

Isaac Crane and J. W. Field each send six dollars for four yearly subscriptions, and A. Overholt $9 for six.

Rev. E. J. Penney of Marietta, Ga., wishes to express his gratitude to the donors of the Cynosure to Southern ministers. He writes: "We like the paper. It especially expresses our sentiments on temperance and lodgery."

THE PROTEST.

The protest against the Masonic ceremonies at the Washington Monument is inserted again this week on page 14. If there are any more names that can be procured send them on to the office of the American Washington, D. C.—THIS WEEK.

It will encourage every worker to know that although most of the signatures were secured within two days' time and very many in a single day, yet the list sent on to Washington from this office Monday night numbered several thousands.

A SINGLE MAIL

on Monday morning brought in 2,334 names! Never before in the history of the reform has such a record been made. Many names have been sent on to Washington already and many more will be sent in later. Had there been two weeks instead of as many days for Anti-masons to work, the protest would have been approved by twenty thousand people.

A request from members of the N. C. A. Board and others was forwarded to Washington last week, requesting Senator Pomeroy, Hon. Frederick Douglass and E. D. Bailey to represent the protestors before the Congressional committee and secure the rejection of the Masonic ceremonies if possible. Senator Pomeroy had already remonstrated with Senator Sherman, who was impressed with the reasons presented, but the Masonic pressure had been so great that there seemed to be little hope of making a change. But there is nothing like making the lodge FEEL that it cannot forever have everything its own way; and this effect our protest will have. Above all let us add to our written remonstrance fervent prayer that these devices of a wicked system may come to naught and that its pride may be humbled and its power over the hearts of men be broken.

President Arthur gave a state dinner to the Justices of the Supreme Court on Wednesday evening last. There was in all the elaborate preparation little of that republican simplicity which formerly graced American manners; but especially in the seven glasses of wine that surrounded each plate and the extra course of Maderia. we see not only an endorsement of the extravagancies of despotism, but also of one of the greatest curses of the race. Such tables will ruin America.

But if the President cares so little for the wishes of the best part of the American people when a depraved appetite would be crossed, he does recognize that demand in ordering the Government exhibit at New Orleans closed or covered on the Sabbath day. In this he sets a good example for other exhibitors who have it in their power to rebuke the inconsistent immorality of the Exposition managers. Let the covered exhibits in every part of the Exposition rebuke both the management and the Sabbath visitor until the desecration shall be shamed to death.

The "boy preacher" extravagance has nearly reached a climax in a circular sent out by an Englishman of St. Paul, which displays, if genuine, so execrable a taste and a worse degree of self-conceit, that it almost stamps the man as an imposter. There has been a tendency of late for a few so-called evangelists to advertise themselves to the disgust of truly pious people. They should be suppressed or men actually called of God to this important work will suffer and the cause of Christ with them.

How soon does success condone for an infamous reputation! Cleveland elected is Cleveland a gentleman. The Republican press, which was yesterday reeking with stories of his vilenesss, forgets to-day the character it has fastened upon him. We do not wish to judge men in reputation for goodness, but the alacrity of the Washington church which Cleveland expects to attend, to get ready for a new Presidential lion, seems to be thoroughly worldly. Especially must the pastor, Rev. Dr. Bartlett, practice enforced forgetfulness of Cleveland's campaign character, or he would not have given up his own pew to the "coming man" and invited him to be a guest in his own house while for a few days waiting for the inaugural ceremonies. At the final judgment wickedness will not be passed by because it has a title.

The reform against the secret lodge needs some one with the enthusiasm of a Miss Willard to lay its reasons and facts before the American people. She determined years ago to carry the message of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union to a thousand towns of our country. This is a task from which the boldest and strongest might have shrunk, and to accomplish it she visited every State and Territory in the Union, and has left unvisited no town of 10,000 inhabitants, save six, and but few of 5,000. The Union has become the strongest society ever organized among women, and before its white banners the fortifications of the saloons power must go down. Probably Miss Willard in her most sanguine moments did not ten years ago, when she climbed to the fifth story Cynosure office to assist in drawing up the W. C. T. U. constitution, dare hope that such a power should be marshaled behind her.

When assassins fall by each other's daggers, honest men look upon it as providential justice. So there were few tears shed when Phelan was stabbed and Rossa shot. If the result shall be to bring out the whole secret plotting of this Fenian cabal, the world will rejoice.

The dynamite craze which these conspirators have fomented in Europe may yet strike nearer home. The operations in the Hocking Valley, Ohio, threaten as much; and the other day the dry goods house of Garry Brothers on Grand street, New York, was attacked with explosives, which did them little damage, however, the force of the explosion being outward and upward, and the store front on the opposite side of the street was badly wrecked. The perpetrators are believed to be members of a secret society, which has been very officious among Garry Bros. clerks, demanding their return if discharged for carelessness or misdemeanor, and ordering a strike if the firm showed fight. From the multitude of sympathizers around O'Donovan Rossa in the hospital, it would appear that the secret society of which he is the head is not contemptible in numbers; and in every large city, even in the South they are forming branches. Their method of securing civil liberty is thus sharply contrasted with the fathers of American independence by the Boston Herald: "It is impossible to think of John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, and Patrick Henry striking for the independence of the colonies by blowing up buildings and killing and wounding innocent people in London. The old way to fight for freedom was to make a square stand-up rebellion on the spot. The common sense of mankind will prefer the old way to the new."

The Congo Conference, after a holiday recess, met again January 8th, when the American Minister, Kasson, plead urgently that the rights of the aborigines be respected. The framework of the proposed Congo State Constitution is based on the principles of the English colonial administration. Brussels will be the headquarters of the government. King Leopold of Belgium has already expended $5,000,000 for the African International Association and promises an annuity of $200,000. An unexpected complication has arisen from the seizure by Portugal of both banks of the Congo at its mouth. The conference had already decided that Portugal had no claim north of the mouth of the Loando several hundred miles to the south. Stanley, the American explorer, whose views had so great weight in the conference, says that if this seizure is allowed, the object of the International Association will be greatly impeded. The decision of the Conference in respect to the slave trade and religious toleration is surely liberal enough for all. It reads: "VI. All the Powers exercising sovereign rights or influence in the aforesaid territories, bind themselves to watch over the preservation of the native tribes, and to care for the improvement of the conditions of their moral and material well-being, and to help in suppressing slavery, and especially the slave trade. They shall, without distinction of creed or nation, protect and favor all religious, scientific or charitable institutions or undertakings, created and organized for the above ends, or which aim at instructing the natives and bringing home to them the blessings of civilization. Christian missionaries, scientists and explorers, with their followers, property and collections, shall likewise be the objects of special protection. Freedom of conscience and religious toleration are expressly guaranteed to the natives, no less than to the subjects (of the Sovereign States) and to foreigners. The free and public exercise of all forms of Divine worship, and the right to build churches, temples and chapels, and to organize religious missions belonging to all creeds, shall not be limited or fettered in any way whatsoever."

Notwithstanding Mr. Horace Waters of this city, offered $500 in cash for proofs of the charges that Gov. St. John was implicated in dishonorable negotiations with either the Republicans or Democrats during the late campaign, and that Hon. A. Baker of Ebensburg, Pa., also offered $1,000 for similar proof, neither of these gentlemen have been called upon to make good their offers.—American Reformer, New York.

A VITAL QUESTION.

BY REV. M. A. GAULT.

The government of the United States, does not put all religions on a level. It makes many discriminations in favor of Christianity, such as recognitions of God in State constitutions, Sabbath laws, the Bible in the schools, religious instruction in prisons, the oath in the courts, etc. But there is a non-religious party in American politics, who claim that these usages are inconsistent with the letter and spirit of our national Constitution. They comprise two hundred and sixty liberal leagues, employing scores of lecturers and papers. They are backed by Romanism, Communism, Socialism, and the Rum power. The National Liberal League preface their demands with the following preamble:

"WHEREAS, The constitution of the United States, from beginning to end, in spirit and in letter, is framed in accordance with the principle of the total separation of church and state; and the treaty with Tripoli, signed by George Washington, as a part of the supreme law of the land, declares emphatically that "the government of the United States is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion, and

WHEREAS, Notwithstanding these facts, the administration of the national government, and the administration of the several state governments maintain numerous practical connections of the state with the church, thereby violating the spirit of the United States Constitution, and the glorious traditions which dedicate this country exclusively to the natural rights of man."

In an editorial in their party organ, the Boston Index, they say: "We assume no defensive attitude. We are for carrying the war into Africa. We spurn the proposal to leave things as they are, on condition that this Christian amendment agitation should cease. No! We have demauds to make. The agitation they depend on as a means of preserving the Christian observances, which still deface the practical administration of this non-Christian government, will ultimately lead to their total abolition. Let them agitate. The struggle between Christianity and secular freedom, for the control of this country, is inevitable, and will only be hastened by agitation."

The spirit and logic of liberalism may best be seen in quotations from their party organs. Their paper in Kansas, the Valley Falls Lucifer, says: "Ours is the only land whose orgauic law recognizes neither God, Ghost or devil." It says: "You claim that God and Jesus have furnished us with a statute book, but we acknowlenge no master, no kiug, no Lord either in earth or Heaven. Our organic law, the Constitution is a thoroughly infidel document—a totally godless instrument." They boast of the Constitution, as embodying their theory of government, because it recognizes no higher authority than the will of the people. The Concordia Blade advocates the taxation of church property, because, "of what value is religion to a people who acknowledge no source of authority or power save themselves?" An editoral in the Wichita (Kas.) Times says. "The God these fellows are trying to get into the Constitution, was not in sympathy with a republican form of government. We don't want him in our Constitution. He has damned this world enough already. We want his name buried beneath the rubbish of the dark ages. Leave this avenging deity with the dead tyrants and monarchs of antiquity. Give us a republican God. We have outgrown the old gentleman."

Ingersoll says: "In 1787 our forefathers retired God from politics. They kept him out of the Constitution, and said that all power comes from the people."

This is not the interpretation that infidelity merely is putting upon the Constitution. Kent and other eminent jurists decided long ago, that Christianity is part of the common law, but Comstock in his popular edition of Kent's Commentaries, declares that "according to the best considered authorities, Christianity is not a part of the common law of the land." Dr. Spear, a high authority in the Presbyterian church, says that "Christianity through the prevalent religion of the people, when the Constitution was adopted, is unknown to it. The Constitution says that it shall be unknown as having any place in the organic law of the United States, or in the legislative powers of Congress."

Rev. W. F. Paddock, D. D., of Philadelphia, said in a sermon a few years ago, that the Constitution "without altering a word, might be received as the fundamental law of the rejectors of the true God." Ex-President Woolsey, of Yale College, in his paper read before the Evangelical Alliance said: "The Constitution of the United States needed no change to adopt it to a Mohammedan nation."

The practical working of liberalism iu our land has been to secure judicial decisions, banishing the Bible from thousands of our public schools. The Supreme Court of California has decided that Sabbath laws cannot be enforced, and the Supreme Court of Ohio has decided that the Bible cannot be legally read in the schools; and the Supreme Court of Illinois has decided that a contract made on Sabbath is just as binding as that made on any other day. Liberalism has well nigh abolished our Sabbath laws. They have in many cases abolished the time-honored custom of prayer in legislative bodies. They have even blotted from some of our national coins the inscription, "In God we Trust." They claim that the marriage relation should be dissolved by mutual consent, and they have so demoralized public sentiment on this subject, that in the courts of Chicago more than fifty divorce cases have been granted in one day. Is not this enough to indicate how we are drifting as a nation?

The tendency is more and more to test every institution by the Constitution. It is the supreme law of the land—the highest declaration of the nation's faith. Because our Christian institutions are not anchored in the Constitution, they are being swept away, one by one before a flood-tide of infidel licentiousness. Is it not time for Christian citizens to combine to maintain these Christian institutions, by securing for them an undeniable legal basis in our fundamental law?

DYNAMITE EXPLOSIONS.

BY H. H. HINMAN.

The recent attempt to blow up London Bridge and more recently the Parliament House, Westminister Hall and London Tower, have filled the civilized world with alarm. Not in Great Britain alone but throughout Europe and America from St. Petersburg to San Francisco, the same influences are at work and the same results are imminent. The burning of coal mines and railroad tunnels in Ohio, and the almost daily murders that are reported in our daily papers belong to the same dark catalogue of crime. Chicago, above most other cities, has in it those influences that, like smoldering volcanoes break out from time to time and spread desolation and death around them.

It would be a serious mistake if we infer that this wide spread condition of human society is accidental, and not the result of causes as actual if not potential as those which produce the earthquake and the volcano.

It becomes a most important question what are these causes, and how shall their terrible effect be obviated? Manifestly they do not consist in the burdens of taxation, inducing poverty and want, and driving men to desperation. That there is much of poverty and want is obvious. That there is much of needless and oppressive taxation is equally so, but manifestly, both in Great Brittain and America, labor is better rewarded and the rights of men on the whole more thoroughly respected than at any period in our previous history. It is estimated by Hon. John Bright that during fifty years the wages of all classes of laborers has increased while the average hours of labor and cost of living have diminished; and this is true in the United States. Fifty years ago the same amount of labor did not procure so much of value for physical or mental well-being as to-day. Nor is it the exactions of employers. These are doubtless sometimes grevious, but not more so than in former periods, nor is there relatively a larger number who need to be unemployed. Never in the history of the world has open-handed charity been more ready to assist the needy or governments been more liberal in providing for the poor.

The causes then that have led to this condition of society are similar to those which underlie the prevalence of suicide and crime in all its multiform shapes. They are:

1. A general decline in morals and religion. Together with a great advancement in knowledge and a vast increase of wealth and all attendant luxuries, there has been a great falling off in the restraints of religion. This is doubtless true of both Catholic and Protestant countries, but especially of the latter. This has resulted in a greatly diminished reverence not only for Divine, but for human authority.

2. The prevalence of intemperance among the lower classes of society. It is not because we as a people drink more, but because the drinking is almost wholly confined to a class of men who are outside the influences of religion or morals.

3. The general prevalence of secret societies. These are not new, but their general prevalence and all-pervading influence is new. At no time in the history of the world was it so great. Such combinations have in all ages made conspiracies possible. They are to-day the source from which emanates all these deeds of darkness and crime. It is not affirmed that all have the same ends or that all are controlled by influences that are equally unscrupulous, but manifestly they are alike in requiring both secrecy and obedience, and alike in denying to the state all right of inspection into their character and conduct. Such similarity in constitution of necessity makes them sympathetic. When a large part of the people belong to orders that claim the absolute right of concealment and deny any responsibility except to themselves, it will be impossible to suppress other secret orders which, constituted in like manner, use their power to conspire against those whom they may regard their enemies.

The remedy for all this crime is not merely the arrest and punishment of the criminals. The disease is lower than the surface and we may not heal it but by constitutional medicine. The nations of Europe (and our own) ought to adopt a system of inter-national arbitration so as to greatly reduce their armies and so relieve the people of the greatest burden of taxation. Great Britain should revise her landed system so that the many, instead of the few, should be land holders. All nations ought to suppress the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks, which would be an incalculable beuefit, especially to the poor. But even these reforms, if they were possible, would not bring the millenium, and manifestly they are not possible except as the result of a great religious reformation—a reformation kindred to that of the sixteenth century. The only reason why Archimedes could not lift the world was that he had no fulcrum on which to place his lever. The only reasou why we have not convinced the world of the evils of the liquor traffic, of war, and of secret societies is that there was in the average mind so little conscience and such general forgetfulness of God.

Secret societies are both a cause and effect of the public demoralization. Like the cholera germs, they are produced by, and are the seeds of corruption. So long as we tolerate Freemasonry in the church and the ministry; so long as those who claim to be men of principle fail to see any evil in its abominations, so long will unprincipled men make use of similar organizations for the accomplishment of the worst of purposes and justify themselves and their conduct. The secret power of Mormonism defies the laws of our nation, the hidden lodges of Europe and the United States are making war on both governments and peoples.

None can tell when terrific explosions may destroy hundreds of lives in New York or Chicago. We are sleeping on the crater of a volcano, and men are saying, "peace, peace, where there is no peace." Let us indeed "Blow the trumpet in Zion and sound an alarm in the holy mountain."

THE KNIGHTS OF LABOR.

Lawyers, gamblers (including speculators in grain), bankers, and saloon-keepers are ineligible for membership. Two years ago the rule prohibiting the admission of physicians was rescinded. Preachers may become Knights of Labor. The obligation of secrecy is absolute, except to Roman Catholics, who are permitted to tell everything to their priests. Some ecclesiastics of this denomination tolerate, if they do not approve, their followers joining the society, while others disapprove. Woman are admitted. The society is provided with passwords and sigus of recognition and distress. Probably there is no secret society disconnected with the Roman Catholic church that has a larger number of Roman Catholic members than the Knights of Labor.

I understand that the only part of the ritual bearing on this confessional matter is contained in the inquiry addressed the candidate before taking the obligation, which is, "Are you willing to take an obligation which will not interfere with your religious belief, or your duty to your country?" The words, "interfere with your religious belief," I infer, are interpreted to mean that members who believe in telling priests everything, may do so and not violate their obligation of secrecy.

My informant claims that the Knights of Labor are very numerous in the United States—all the way from 50,000 to 100,000—yet they are not numerous in England, only one assembly (or lodge) existing in that country at date of last report.

The lower branch of the Michigan legislature is nearly evenly divided between the two political parties, the balance of power beiug held by Knights of Labor. The Republicans nominated for speaker one of their number, who is a Knight; he was elected. Two Knights, nominated by the workingmen, and endorsed by Republicaus, voted for the successful candidate for speaker, for which they have been subjected to severe criticism by the Democrats, but not from their brother Kuights, as far as I know.—Com.

JUDGED FROM WITHOUT.

We may fairly graut that persons who are inside of any organization, especially if it be a close corporatiou, like the Masons or the Odd-fellows, have the best opportunity to know what its professed principles and aims are. On the other hand it is quite likely that those who, from the outside, view the workiug of its principles and life, are quite as well qualified to judge of its real character, as are those whose personal interests in their pet institutions may blind their eyes to its faults, and make them its defenders, right or wrong. There can be no better rule for determining such matters thau that given by Christ, "By their fruits ye shall know them." Judge( by this rule, in their relations to the church of Christ, the societies mentioned must be regarded not as its allies, but as its enemies, for at least two reasons: 1. They beget and foster the spirit of clanishness. instead of the broad catholic spirit which is the very essence of the Gospel. 2. They absorb the loyalty of their members which should be given to Christ and his cause as represented by his church. Christian men who are too poor to give anything to the support of the church of which they are members, and who never think of giving anything to send the Gospel to the destitute, can pay their expensive dues to their lodge, and appear to think it no hardship. Also, men whose business engagements are such that they cannot attend the appointments for religious work and worship in their own church, as a rule, do not find the same difficulty in the way of their lodge appointments. There are, no doubt, exceptions to this statement, but as a rule, we have not found the supporters of the lodges of much account in the work of the church.—Sabbath Recorder, Jan. 22.

"NONE OF THESE THINGS MOVE ME."

Thus spake the hero Paul
As forward to the battle-field
He pressed with helmet, sword, and shield.
And witness of the dangers all,
The Holy Ghost to him made known
His trial, pain, and loss;
Yet he undaunted went alone
To meet his cross.

Work for the heroes still
Have we; the battlements of wrong
Are high and bold and broad and strong;
And love of heart and power of will,
Must urge the soldier to the scene,
Where but the bravest dare
To force the breach and pass between
The volleys there.

Soldier of Christ, fear not!
The chains and bonds which you await Shall make the old world free and great;
No valiant deed shall be forgot;
And every word of love you speak
Shall have its sweet reward,
With blessings from the bruised and weak,
And Christ your Lord.

—Rev. Dwight Williams, Cazenovia, N. Y., in N. Y. Witness.

THE CHARACTER OF WASHINGTON.

In reply to a slanderous attack upon the memory and character of Washington last fall, by a New York journal which advocated Cleveland and condoned his record of infamy, the Watchman, a leading Baptist paper of Boston, comes to the defense of the Father of his country. If it is slanderous to point to Washington as a defense for lechery, why is not the present attempt of the Masonic lodge to associate their blasphemy, and horseplay and despotism and idolatry with the name every true American delights to honor, much more shameful? And why should not the American press not raise a united voice against the proposed lodge ceremonies on the 22d of February? The Watchman says:

We remember the reverence with which President Jared Sparks, of Harvard, spoke to us of Washington soon after the conpletion of his Life of the Father of his Country. He said to us: "I found nothing, absolutely nothing, in all his private and public correspondence that might not, without detriment to his good name, be published to the world. Under all the circumstances, I regard his public and private example and virtues the most remarkable in history, for their uniform and symmetrical excellence."

Some thirty years since, while at Washington for a brief period, we spent a day with Mr. Custis at his home, "Arlington." No others were present, and much of the time was passed in listening to personal reminiscences of Washington, from the lips of one whose early life was passed in the family circle of the General at Mt. Vernon. At one point in the interview Mr. Custis was speaking, as he expressed it, "of the atmosphere that always was felt in the personal presence of General Washington," and continued: "This influence, or whatever you may call it, was recognized by all that came in contact with him, as I have seen and can recall in the interviews with the most illustrious of his associates, Franklin, Adams, Jefferson, Hamilton, and others. All the members of his family circle were impressed with it; and under the most familiar conditions of our home life, I never lost the consciousness, personally, of that influence."

The stress laid upon the matter by Mr. Custis prompted the inquiry by us, "What, in your opinion, was this influence, the impression of which was so powerfully felt by all who met the General?"

The manner and expression of Mr. Custis will never be forgotten by us, in his reply, so pertinent in the present issue.

"Young man, the emotions I felt in the presence of Washington were like those experienced in addressing the Deity, and for similar reasons. The purity of his daily life was such as that I could but regard him with awe, as a superior being."

This answer recalled the address on a title page of a volume presented by Lord Erskine to Washington, which read, "You are the only man for whom I have ever felt an awful reverence."

We believe no private or public imputation upon the character of Washington will change the universally accepted verdict embodied in the eulogy of Lord Brougham:

"In proportion as indtviduals or society make progress in virtue or patriotism, in that proportion will they advance toward the pedestal of Washington."

A GRAND LODGE OF SAMARIA.

In an able sermon upon modern idolatry from the text "They feared the Lord and served their own gods" (2 Kings 17: 33), in the College Church, Wheaton, Sabbath, Feb. 1st, Rev. A. Chittenden read from the following account, showing with great clearness the corrrespondence of these modern sacred rites of Masonry with the abominable idolatry of the colonists of Samaria. The account is a New York telegram, Dec. 30, 1884:

The Grand Lodge of Sorrow, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Freemasonry, was held in the Academy of Music Sunday evening. The auditorium was filled nearly every prominent Mason in the city being present. The lodge held funeral services in memory of members ranging from the fourteenth to the thirty-third degree of Masonry, who have died within the last six years. The ceremony may not inappropriately be termed a grand Masonic requiem mass for the repose of the souls of Sidney P. Nichols, H. Gardner, Charles Blackie, George W. Roome, James M. Martin, Gustavus A. Fuller and sixty-two other lamented citizens who have died rich in Masonic honors.

The services opened with a full lodge in session on the stage. Its members wore rich regalia. In set Masonic terms, the Lodge of Sorrow was opened, the venerable Master saying that they had met to honor the dead and sympathize with friends and relatives in their affliction. A canclestiek, with seven burning candles, stood near the prompter's box. It was flanked by tall candelabra and Masonic bannerets and gonfalons. These emblems remained in the foreground during the entire ceremony, and even when the curtain was lowered.

The second part of the pageant was devoted to the funeral serviees in honor of the dead. A catafalque surmounted by a bier and coffin, all covered with a black pall, stood in the center of the stage. A pedestal topped with a blazing pan of fire, stood in each corner of the funeral pile. The stage was set to a scene from "Aida," which gave the rite an Egyptian coloring. The scenery represented the interior of a temple on the Nile. The solemn strains of Mendelsohn's, "song without words" arose from the orchestra as an army of neophytes in black gowns with triangular aprons of a violet hue, and cabalistle caps issued from the wings of the stage. They marched and countermarched around the catafalque, and were finally ranged in solid columns on the right and on the left. A chorus of forty voices, with an organ accompaniment, then intoned the "Integer Vitae," and nineteen tiny girls dressed in white with silvered sashes and bearing baskets of flowers, moved around the bier scattering roses at its base. A flaxen-haired little one, as beautiful as an angel, took her place in front of the catafalque, while her sisters ranged themselves at its side. When the baskets were emptied, the little ones melted within the wings, and the orchestra played Beethoven's funeral mareh. A file of acolytes, clothed in hooded white gowns, entered from the left of the stage, and another file arrayed in in hooded black gowns, came in from the right. Both files wore triangular aprons, red in color. Their brows were crowned with fillets of silver. They marched and countermarched around the catafalque, keeping step to the mourhful strains of a dirge, and drew up in front of the neophytes, the white gowns on the left and the black ones on the right.

Then General J. H. Hobart Ward, resplendant in the robes of a Jewish high priest, descended from a platform at the back of the stage. Walter M. Fleming and John F. Collins, the assistant priests, accompanied him. Fleming's arms were bare. Both he and Collins wore rich robes, and might have been easily mistaken, in view of the surroundings, for priests of Isis and Osiris.

The three priests mounted a dais overlooking the catafalque. Seven men clad in black gowns with white surplices, bearing broad red crosses on the breast and back, then stepped to the front and halted near the seven-cornered candlestick. The first uttered an aphorism on life and death, and said in a solemn tone of voice:

"To the memory of Chas. S. Arthur, Charles Blackie, Gustavus A. Fuller, Gregory Satterlee, Sidney P. Nichols, Hugh Gardner, Isaac H. Brown, and Lewis F. Hoppel."

He then stepped to the brazen candlestick, and turned out one of the seven lights. Then one of his companions uttered another aphorism, named seven more of the dead, and turned out another of the seven lights.

This was continued until similar honor had been paid to all of the dead, and the lights of the brazen seven armed candlesticks had been totally extinguished. The Seven Knights of the Cross then retired to the back of the stage, and Miss Jennie Fish, Frederick Harvey and Carl Bergs passed around the catafalque and sang Rossini's prayer from "Moses."

The high priest then delivered a short invocation, and the acolytes raised their torches and again marched round the funeral pile. After another chorus the marching and counter-marching was resumed. A black-robed figure alternated with a white-robed figure, and in this order the file stood on the right and left of the catafalque. Miss Christine Rosswog sang the solo: "I will extol thee," in a pure tone of voice; after which Priest Collins, Priest Fleming and High Priest Ward delivered short funeral orations.

The pans of fire at the corners of the catafalque burned out during the funeral addresses.

Of the three speeches, Mr. Fleming's was much the best. In the language of an intelligent Mason, Fleming "was the Marc Antony of the occasion."

After the addresses and appropriate music, the curtain fell.

In the third part of the funeral ceremonies the scenery had been changed. It apparently represented a crypt under some old Egyptian temple. The stage was darkened, and the black and white figures reappeared with dimmed torches, which threw a lurid light on their silver fillets. They marched and counter-marched, forming triangles, squares and crosses, and various other Masonic emblems.

When the sombre draped figures were again ranged on each wing of the stage, the bier and coffin, with a heavy pall, were brought in, the red crossed figures acting as pall-bearers.

Chopin's funeral march was played. after which there were more aphorisms on life and death, and the coffin was raised and borne to an imaginary tomb in the wing of the stage.

A benediction was next announced and the curtain fell.

In the last seene, the lodge was again in session. Jerome Buck made the peroration, and the lodge was closed in due and ancient form, the whole ceremony ending with a hallelujah chorus.

It was long after midnight before the Lodge of Sorrow was closed. While impressive, the ceremony could hardly be called instructive to any but Royal Arch Masons. But for the Scriptural allusions and quotations, those who were not Masons, and even members of the Blue Lodges, might have taken it for some pagan rite of the time of Ptolemy rather than a funeral ceremony of the nineteenth century.

—Striking testimony to the advanee of the Gospel in Japan is borne by Dr. Hepborn, of the Presbyterian mission, who is translating the Old Testament into Japanese. He says: "Fifteen or twenty years hence I doubt whether foreign missionary will be needed in this country. We have already a synod, three presbyteries, twenty-nine ardent native ministers, one hundred and seventeen young men in our colleges, and a thousand church members and Sabbath-school scholars. And I have lived to see all this! Japan is emerging rapidly from heathenism; it can never go back. If all the foreign missionaries were expelled to-morrow the work would be carried on by natives."

—Bad company will blacken if not burn. Wicked associations will both corrupt and punish children. A father illustrated this by telling his child to pick up a coal from the grate aud bring it to him. She replied: "It will burn me, father." "No, he replied, it cannot for the fire is out." "But," persisted his little daughter, "it will blacken my hand." "Yes," he replied, "it will." Your company you sa will not corrupt you for you are too pure, but it ma blacken your reputation. If the coal does not burn, it will blacken.

BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS:

OR

THE QUESTION OF THE HOUR.

BY E. E. FLAGG, AUTHOR OF "HOLDEN WITH CORDS."

CHAPTER X.

IN WHICH THE QUESTION IS MET FACE TO FACE.

Nelson went to his work day after day with a strange new sense of uneasiness. There was an ominous electricity in the air—the presence of unknown forces which he could not guage or analyze any more than he could that mysterious power that can change the face of the solid land and fling up mountain peaks in mid ocean. A strike in the dead of winter, with all its entailed idleness and pinching want, was a folly that he found nearly as difficult to understand as voluntary suicide. Nor did he believe that the men themselves, if left to the dictates of their own common sense, would adopt a remedy so much worse than the disease; but he strongly suspected what really proved to be the case, that the same Union agent whose advances he had so bluntly repelled was secretly and with no inconsiderable success laboring to foment discontent among the other hands. Some hundreds were employed in the works, foreigners and native born, as miscellaneous in their political and religious creed as in their nationality, but nearly all bound together by the tie of the secret Trades Union.

"The fellow is a disguised socialist," he said to Martha; "and I believe he is doing a great deal of mischief in his smooth, quiet kind of way. The majority of the men are too ignorant or too unthinking to see that any attempt to injure capital is simply cutting their own fingers. They know they are unjustly treated, and the impulse is to strike in a blind, blundering fashion at what they think is hurting them. They don't stop to consider that three or four months of enforced idleness, during which he will receive no wages at all, is an injury far more real to the working man than to be docked of a portion, however unfairly. But I've talked till I begin to think the wisest way is to keep silence. I believe already some of the men—and they are honest fellows whose good opinion I value—are beginning to look upon me as taking sides with their employers, and acting the part of a traitor to my own class."

"And if the order comes to strike?" queried Martha.

"I shall obey it, of course. To do anything else would be like trying to stem the tide of Niagara. If it was merely the local Union one had to withstand, resistance would be possible; but behind every subordinate Union stands the National Union, and simply to attempt resistance would be to be ground between the upper and the nether millstones. You know I don't mean to go back on what I have always said," added Nelson, struck by a sudden sense of incongruity which he felt that the keen-witted Martha would be sure to note. "Some people call this depotism; I don't. I grant that the National Union wields a tremendous power, but it is only what the workingman needs to counterbalance the money power of the capitalist. I grant, too, that like other kinds of power it is liable to abuse and incidental disadvantages. A locomotive is an excellent thing, but it sometimes runs off the track. So is a steamboat, but it sometimes bursts its boilers; and then we have an investigation, and a verdict of criminal carelessness, or ignorance, or incompetence, on the part of somebody or other; but no one suggests that we had better go back to stages and sailboats."

Martha knew better than to hint that all this elaborate and uncalled-for display of argument was a confession of weakness; an attempt to convince himself rather than her; and Nelson continued after a moment's silence:

"Of course I have my private reasons for not desiring a strike just now. My board will be paid by the Union, and something additional for Tom's support, but in his present state he has to have a good many things in the way of food and medicine that would not be taken into the account. If the strike is long continued I shall have to fall back on the money I have laid up. The result will be a longer deferring of our marriage and the spoiling of a good many of my plans. Still I don't want to look at the matter selfishly, as if my own interest was the only thing to be considered. If Jacksonville could have been carried for no-license last fall, I shouldn't mind the strike half so much. The new mayor may talk temperance as much as he pleases; I don't trust him. He was elected by liquor votes, and when a pinch comes he won't dare offend the party to whom he owes his office. So this is the way the few govern the many. I was foolish enough once to suppose that the majority ruled, but I'm beginning to change my mind."

It will be observed that in thus declaiming against the liquor oligarchy, while he patiently submitted to the ordering of a few irresponsible lodge leaders, Nelson was straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel in the sweetly unconscious fashion of our inconsistent humanity generally.

"I know I was terribly disappointed with the results of the last election," said Martha, thoughtfully; "and I don't think I felt quite right about it till Mrs. Haviland talked to us so beautifully at our last W. C. T. U. meeting. She gave us a Bible reading from the eighty-first psalm, dwelling especially on the seventh verse: 'I answered thee in the secret place of thunder; I proved thee at the waters of Meribah.' She said some among us could look back to the days of the Crusades when we were small and weak, with no weapon but prayer, and remember how gloriously God answered us 'in his secret place of thunder.' Now we are an army with banners marching in to possess the land. If he allowed the wicked a momentary triumph it was only to prove us as he proved Israel at the waters of Meribah. We must put down every feeling of discouragement and rest patiently in the promises; and when we had thus prepared the way for him in our hearts we should see his salvation. Nelson, I held my breath while she was speaking. I am not a perfectionist. I don't believe the best of us live without sinning, yet I could never see a single human weakness in that woman. I remember reading somewhere that refiners of silver consider the process finished when the metal perfectly reflects the face of the person who bends over the crucible. I always think of that when I see Mrs. Haviland and remember what she has gone through. I never look at her nor hear her speak without gaining a more vivid and personal conception of Christ himself, as a real, living, ever-present Saviour."

Nelson did not answer for a moment, and then he said with a sigh, "I suppose I ought to have a stronger faith, Martha; but I believe women are always more gifted in that line than men."

"Well, you see it gave me a kind of new revelation. I went away from the meeting perfectly satisfied. I hate this dreadful business as much as ever, and my heart is just as sore over the misery it causes; but I know God hates it worse than I can and pities its victims infinitely more. And I feel so sure the day is hastening when he will answer the prayers of the souls crying under the altar that I am willing to see the politicians play their little game a while longer. I am even willing to see the beauties of 'high license' illustrated in Jacksonville the coming year."

"High fiddlesticks," said Nelson. "I believe it is worse in one sense than the free, unlicensed sale, for it is a greater swindle and delusion. A few of the smaller fry among the saloon-keepers will have to go under, but that will only make better standing room for the others. This compromising with evil, I hate. I want the lines sharply drawn. If there are but a handful on the right side and God with us, I don't care. Let it be war with the liquor traffic, and war to the knife; but for heaven's sake none of these disgraceful, halting compromises that only make the evil worse."

"Precisely my sentiments, Mr. Newhall; but how is Tom to-day?"

"I think he is improving. He's certainly stronger and don't cough near so much. I have been careful not to give him liquor in his medicines in even the smallest quantity, and since his sickness he has seemed to show no desire for it. All will be well if his appetite for drink can be kept dormant. But, O Martha, just think for a moment what this dreadful traffic in human misery has done for me and mine! How it has orphaned us, crushed the mind of my only brother, and made me a stranger to my own sister! And yet Government sanctions it, coolly puts the wages of blood into its treasury. What do they care, these Congressmen, only to keep their places and draw their salaries."

Nelson spoke bitterly; but, reader, put yourself in the place of this young workman as he looked back over his shadowed childhood and sorrowful youth, and remembered that the very government under which he was born had made itself a party to his wrongs.

"Nelson," said Martha, taking up her pocket Bible, "let me read you something that has comforted me a great many times when everything looked all wrong and mixed up. 'Fret not thyself because of evil-doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity. For they soon shall be cut down like the grass and wither as the green herb. Trust in the Lord and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land and verily thou shalt be fed.'"

Nelson's brow cleared. It seemed so like his mother's own voice that he felt a strange calm enwrap his soul as she read. The eternal rock of God's righteousness stood firm; and what was human wrong and injustice but passing waves that dashed against its immovable base to be swept into the tide of the yesterdays, and leave not a trace behind on his grand to-morrow, when there shall be a new heavens and a new earth; but no more sea, no angry whirlpool of opposing moral issues, but for every great and burning question that agitates the nations to-day a final, irrevocable settlement by the laws of everlasting Right.

"Thank you, Martha," he said when she finished. "It has done me good."

The next day—it was about two weeks before New Year's—the order came to strike. It was a cold, cloudy morning, the call to work had just sounded, and the men were trooping in with their dinner-pails, but in an hour the whole place was deserted and silent. A Napoleon might have envied the power which had only to issue its mandate and be thus obeyed. To be sure it is a power fraught with some danger—more particularly in a republic which asserts every fourth of July as its foundation doctrine, the sacred, inalienable rights of the individual citizen, which would seem to include among other things the right to sell his own work at his own price.

During the day the men gathered in little groups and talked over the situation. There were rumors of a compromise. It was said that the employers had expressed themselves willing to make certain concessions if met half way, and were conferring to this end with a committee from the Union. The result was awaited hopefully by some. Others, in whom was working the socialistic leaven, were less anxious for a peaceful settlement of the difficulty. Nelson found himself in the course of the day in the midst of one of these groups.

"Newhall don't believe in strikes; thinks the manufacturers ought to be allowed to make their pile of money and grind us working men into the dirt," was the greeting that fell on his ears as he came up. Nelson happened to know the speaker very well, and thought this a good chance to prove to his fellow-workmen that he held opinions of an exactly opposite tenor to those imputed to him.

"Now be fair," he said good-humoredly, "and let me tell you what I really do think. Granted that every manufacturer in the country is making his money unjustly, don't that money go to create more capital? And how can cutting off the fountain which supplies us with our wages make us any better off? It is playing a game in which we have hardly one chance in a thousand of coming out ahead. But I don't believe, and I want you to understand that I don't believe, in tamely submitting to wrong. I am only talking against the kind of resistance that bounds back on ourselves and leaves us worse off than we were before. What hinders us working men from putting our money and brains together and running factories and shops and mills on our own account? Now there would be a kind of resistance based on justice and common sense."

"What hinders us? Hain't these moneyed rascals got the staff in their own hands? and don't they mean to keep it there?"

"How did they get it in the first place?" asked Nelson, coolly. "Most of our rich men began life with hardly a cent. Now I think it is a pity if three or four hundred working men, if they are sober, industrious and skillful at their trade, can't be equal to at least one capitalist."

"That's all fool's talk," growled the leader in the group, a man of German parentage, but American born and bred. "The power is all on the side of the rich, and there's got to be a revolution, a turning upside down of society before things will be righted."

"But just remember," answered Nelson, good-naturedly, "that when this general overturning comes on if you and I should happen to be under the heap it might be awkward for us. Volcanoes and earthquakes may be necessary things, but it always seemed to me that I had a little rather keep out of their range. The fact is, Schumacher, you have read these papers that talk as if American working men were all in a state of serfdom till you have begun to believe it It is no such thing. Not a capitalist under heaven could 'grind us into the dirt' if we all understood as we ought to that labor has got a vantage ground of its own. Our numbers are our defenced city, and, to make it as impregnable as Gibralter, we only need intelligence, sobriety, economy, and I am going to add, though I know you have thrown both these things overboard, faith in God and hope in a hereafter."

"Hang your religious rubbish. What do we know about a hereafter, whether we shall be nothing or start up cabbages."

"For my part," responded Nelson, "I had rather a good honest cabbage should spring from my dust and that be the end of me than to go into the other world weighed down with all the rascalities and meannesses that some men have to carry with them, and if your belief helps to make life more cheerful, why I am glad. It would have just the opposite effect on me. But we are wandering wide of the question. What hinders us working men? What is the foe in the rear that is always hanging on the skirts of the great army of labor? It is these thousands on thousands of legalized dramshops scattered over the country. So long as we are content to keep an army of lazy saloonists living on the fat of the land there is no sense nor reason in our cursing capitalists. Just look at this thing a minute. The nine hundred millions that it takes every year to keep the country's one hundred and seventy-five thousand dramshops running means so many millions less to run its shops and stores and mills; and do you suppose because you are neither drunkards nor tipplers yourselves that you can escape paying your share of this enormous tax when it is money taken right out of every honest business by which working men earn their living? This monstrous traffic sucks industry's very life blood, and which side, think you, feels the drain the most, the capitalist who, when he sees a hard time ahead, can haul in his sails with no great inconvenience to himself and wait till the storm blows over? or the average working man to whom a 'shut down' means less food, less fire, less of everything that makes life comfortable and pleasant?. Take off this terrible tariff, this millstone round the neck of labor, and what would be the result? Why, it would increase its earning power at least one-third, which is the same as to say that you let rum take one dollar out of every three you earn, and bear it patiently, while you grumble and growl if a manufacturer cuts you down in your wages twenty cents!"

THE DAY OF PRAYER AT GATES COLLEGE.

NELIGH, Neb. Feb. 2d, 1885.

DEAR BRO. KELLOGG:—The Cynosure comes regularly to our home, receiving a cordial welcome. Its principles are taking root in our College to bear fruit, without doubt, in the lives of our pupils. May God grant us wisdom and courage to found our young work here on that foundation other than which no man can lay.

The "Day of Prayer for Colleges" was observed by us for the first time, last Thursday. In our three hours' meeting, beginning at 9 A. M. and closing at noon, at which all our pupils enrolled were present but three and remained to the close, nearly all took an active part in the religious exercises, and others asked the prayers of Christians that they might follow Christ.

The students have their noon prayer-meeting for fifteen minutes each school-day, at which sometimes thirty take part in that time. We have averaged about nine-tenths of the entire enrollment present at chapel exercises each morning during the past, "coldest season ever known in Nebraska"—from twenty to thirty degrees below zero for successive days. Remember us when you pray.

Very fraternally yours,

(Pres.) M. L. HOLT.

FROM THE FREEDMEN'S ACADEMY, KANSAS.

DUNLAP, Kan., Jan. 30th, 1885.

We are getting quite an interest worked up and are gaining friends to the good cause in and around Dunlap. Our work here is missionary, wholly, and we work oftentimes under great discouragements and many disadvantages.

We have a circulating library connected with our school consisting of 800 volumes, all donations from friends. In this we have a copy of "In the Coils," which is being read by a good many. We also got quite a number of copies from Mr. Feemster of "Masonry at a Glance," and find they have done good. We seem to have an opening now for doing good in many ways. The Masons were trying to devour our flock entirely and we made the effort to get Mr. Starry here. We prayed earnestly that God would use him as the means to destroy the foul demon in our midst, and we feel that our prayers have been answered largely, although our good brother suffered severely at their hands, for which he has our deepest sympathy and heartfelt gratitude for his boldness and unflinching courage in duty amidst the most perilous danger. May God abundantly bless him with grace and courage to prosecute his work wherever he may be called. When that stone struck him on the cheek the dragon of Masonry got as severe a blow on the head—even more so, for it has scarcely been able to open its mouth since.

THE FRENCH WORK IN CHICAGO.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE:—Allow me a small space in your fearless review to state how the work of reformation is getting along among the French people of this wretched city.

At the outset I must thank the Lord for taking charge of this work both spiritually and temporally. Since last March I have been struggling very hard indeed, having no salary whatsoever, to run this important and necessary work of evangelizing my country-men of Chicago who number 25,000. Although I belong to the Presbytery of Chicago, if it had not been for Mr. Scoville of this city, who gave me the use of Maskell Hall, where I have preached some six months, I would have been obliged to be a Salvationist and preach on the street. At all events, I am still living and will live yet to see some more of this blessed work which is doing well despite the many oppositions of the Romish church and the seeming apathy of our friends, the Protestants; which is a mystery to me, especially when I look at John's Epistle, which says, "We know that we are passed from death unto life if we have love for the brethren."

During our religious revival in January, the Lord has been moving continually among the French Catholics of this city. Despite the severe orders of their priests not to come and hear the apostates, Chiniquy and Seguin, we had an audience of from 200 to 500 French and Romanists during the whole week. What is more astonishing, is that they behaved very well all the time; they listened eagerly; came and asked for French Testaments, Bibles and tracts. A French priest who is still in the active ministry in this city came to me last Friday for counsel and admission in the work. Yesterday, the 4th inst., another priest, thirty-six years of age, came to me also for the same purpose. Now, Mr. Editor, to be short, let me ask you as well as your readers: What shall I do with these priests and other converts when I can hardly have the bread and butter for my wife and myself, unless those who are in earnest in the religion of Christ, come to my rescue?

MORE ABOUT LEBBEUS ARMSTRONG.

ARCADE, N. Y. Feb. 2, 1884.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Rev. Lebbeus Armstrong preached to a Congregational church in the town of Moreau, Saratoga County, N. Y., in March, 1808, when Dr. Billy J. Clark of the same place came to see him about organizing a temperance society in opposition to the prevailing evils of intemperance.

Said society was organized on the 30th day of April, 1808, in Moreau, a town in the vicinity of the villages of Fort Edward, Sandy Hill, and Glenn's Falls, N. Y.

This temperance society, the first one organized so far as we know, contained in its constitution the following articles, among others.

ART. 4.—No member shall drink rum, gin, whisky, wine or any distilled spirits, or compositions of the same, or any of them, except by advice of a physician, or in case of actual disease; also, excepting wine at public dinners, under penalty of twenty-five cents: provided that this article shall not infringe on any religious ordinance.

SEC. 2.—No member shall be intoxicated under penalty of fifty cents.

SEC. 3.—No member shall offer any of said liquors to any other member, or urge any other person to drink thereof, under penalty of twenty-five cents for each offense.

On the first annual meeting of the temperance aforesaid society, members present were required, each to state the effects of said organization on the custom of his household.

Capt. Payne, an extensive farmer and lumber dealer, responded as follows: "During a series of years past I have made it a rule annually to purchase a hogshead of rum for the year's consumption. After signing the pledge a year ago, I purchased a five gallon keg of rum. My reason for this was, that my business required a few excellent laborers, not one of whose help I could obtain without some liquor. During the year I used my influence to reduce the amount used, using none in my family as a beverage, and on examination this morning found the keg half full. Reduced in one year from a hogshead to the half of a five gallon keg of rum, and my business never better performed."

I saw Rev. Lebbeus Armstrong at Albany in 1853 at a grand temperance rally of the State of New York, of those who were in favor of the Maine Law. No one was more in earnest in its favor than father Armstrong.

I have written so much in response to your request. Success to you in your work. May the sword of the Spirit, the word of God, ever be your most valued weapon.

P. H. PARKER.

A LETTER FROM GREECE.

ANDROS, Greece, via Syra, Dec. 22, 1884.

DEAR BRO. K.:—Since last we wrote to you we saw the notice in the Cynosure of the death of our dear sister, Mrs. Pres. C. A. Blanchard. Another noble woman and Wheaton College friend has passed away; and we see one thing that God is doing for that institution, that he took away some of its best and noblest friends. Why he afflicted so much Wheaton College, we cannot tell. It is beyond our comprehension and a science of heaven which the earth is far from explaining.

The Christian receives consolation and hope from the promises of the Bible. The Christian can take it kindly and believes that what God does, it is all for the best. At the same time the infidel when death comes upon his family or relations, having no place to trust and to hope, is tempted or driven to suicide and this takes place every day among the unbelievers.

I was acquainted personally with the dear sister; she was a noble and true woman, true to her Saviour, and so she was to the end. For even her last words, especially to the unconverted, were very striking.

May the God of all give strength and power from on high to Pres. C. A. Blanchard, so that he may be able to endure this affliction which has come upon him. Your brother in Christ,

A. D. ZARAPHONITHES.

PROHIBITION—PROS AND CONS.

During half a century the temperance question has been before those who speak and read our language. First, it took a stand against alcoholic drinks as a beverage, and I, after a while, put my name on the list and there I stood without becoming a teetotler, regarding the total abstainers as we do the soldiers and police-parties we willingly sustain though not exactly doing their work. However, as the sun sends the dawn before its rising, so is light on moral and political questions, yea, and on those of Christianity itself, progressive.

And so it has been with me regarding the pros and cons of prohibition, the result being that I am enjoying the full noon-day summer sun, radiant with the truth that the pros have the light, and the cons the darkness on this great topic. But in every age among the friends on almost every question, arise two parties—the one of principle dominant and the other of policy dominant; the one ready like Peter and Paul to die if required by opponents, the other ready to turn their course to avoid the prejudices and passions of existing interests and opinions, and yet even the Peters and Pauls, the Abrahams and Davids, were on occasions found to "dissemble" and "walk not uprightly." The only perfect one who was "The Truth" and "in whose mouth was found no guile," he alone is ever the perfect exemplar. Let us ever ask what he would have done in our place and act accordingly.

Now as prohibition has grown enough to have political attention in this country and Great Britain, the question is no longer merely personal but world wide. And I for one hereby declare my deepest conviction to be that prohibition ought to be one of the leading questions in every place where elective institutions exist, whether municipal or legislative. Away with the great cause of crime! What? Scatter the gunpowder and give everyone matches to play with! Delight in dynamite and therefore place it in every home!

A few accidents or murders awaken horror, but the cause of a wide-spread cancerous curse over the whole world must not be prohibited! Every tender relationship of life and every noblest feature of manhood have been and daily do become the sacrifices on the altars of Bacchus, the god which is served by the liquor traffic.

There is no argument on the subject, there can be none on the principle, and the argument for the policy reminds one of that in Eden when the arch enemy of mankind entailed his perfidious curse upon our race. Yes, yes, prohibit in every way possible the use of one of his most powerful agents in perpetuating every grossest outrage against God and man.

A SCOT.

PITH AND POINT.

EARNED HIS VOTE.

Last fall was the second time I have voted all alone at the Presidential election. When I went to Sublimity to vote I found no St. John ballots. So I went to Stayton and got one, and came back to Sublimity and voted for J. P. St. John. Since the Republicans burned him in effigy I think more of him than ever. When Senator Pomeroy withdrew from the race I could hardly make up mind whether to vote for St. John or Blaine; but after asking God for light on the subject, it would come to my mind, Can you, being an Anti-mason, vote for J. A. Logan, a 32-degree Mason, and being a prohibitionist, vote for him who wants to make this rum traffic appear before the law with a clean face?—JOHN HEPBURN, Knight, Oregon.

WELCOME THE CYNOSURE.

Your paper is welcomed at our house. We read it eagerly and then hand it to our neighbors. We want the light to shine all over this western country. We endorse it right straight through and pray God that the reform may be accomplished. We hope to get the Kansas agent to lecture for us as soon as we possibly can. Bro. Feemster was here and lectured for us once. Praise God for the light he left; it is living and burning in the hearts of the people to-day. I distributed your papers and tracts at our camp-meeting and I think they did much good. Let all good, honest people, especially those who are not able to own good farms in the East know that there are plenty of cheap homes here. Any information desired I will cheerfully give.—M. R. BECKTELL, Macksville, Kan.

A HAPPY GATHERING.

January 30th there was a pleasant gathering at the mansion of Dr. J. C. Miles in Dalton, Pa., in commemoration of his 67th birthday. It was good to meet the host and hostess with their genial faces and words of cheer; while their daughter, Miss Carrie, with her musical and conversational talents, helped make the hour one long to be remembered by every one present. A sumptuous dinner was partaken of about 3 o'clock P. M., and all expressed the wish that the Doctor would live long to celebrate many birthdays. He and his wife stand side by side on the temperance reform. The Doctor voted for St. John, and I hope will live many years to vote right and condemn the wrong.—ONE WHO WAS PRESENT, Waverly, Pa.

PUSH THE AMERICAN PARTY.

Since the election St. John has gained friends here. It is believed by some that the temperance reform will not come through either of the old parties. The American reform party should gain the ascendency if properly managed. Quite a number in this vicinity will cast their votes with reform unless there are greater changes in the old parties than we can expect. I voted the Republican ticket; if I had to vote over again it would be for St. John. I believe there are thousands in our land who would do likewise. I say, let every subscriber for the Cynosure be a worker for reform. Let us give our money and get our issue before the people at once. Go to work at once, that we may show our leaders that we mean something. (I have reference to such men as Clarkson, editor of the Iowa State Register.) I say, make up a moral reform ticket which is the interest of the American people.—THOMAS PRATT, Carlisle, Iowa.

LESSON VIII.—February 22, 1885.—Paul before the Council. Acts 23: 1-11.

GOLDEN TEXT.—And the night following the Lord stood by him, and said, Be of good cheer, Paul. Acts 23: 11.

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. A conscience void of offense. v. 1. Paul does not here mean to claim perfection, only purity and singleness of motives. Even his persecuting of the saints had been through sincere, but mistaken, religious zeal. The radical sins which separate us from God are alike in all—an unrenewed mind, a heart of unbelief, and a will at variance with his. Grace excludes boasting, yet the deep-set humility may co-exist with the strongest consciousness of moral rectitude. A blameless life is one of the Christian's most unanswerable arguments before the world for the truth of what he professes. When Paul called himself "the chief of sinners" he referred to his life as it appeared to him when looking at it from the Godward side; when he said to the Sanhedrim, "I have lived in all good conscience unto this day," he spoke of his personal character as it appeared in the eyes of men, and neither statement was inconsistent with the other.

2. Honor to rulers. vs. 2–5. The outburst of righteous wrath, "God shall smite thee," seems to have been almost prophetic, as Ananias who commanded this outrage in direct violation of the Mosaic law which scrupulously regarded the rights of a prisoner, was assassinated, according to Josephus, during the Jewish war. Paul's graceful apology must be considered as honor paid to his office rather than to its vile and hypocritical incumbent. Christianity, while it commands obedience to lawful rule, is a most rigid censor on iniquity in high places. It is only through such dissemination of its principles as will lead rulers and rich men to use their wealth and power in benefiting instead of oppressing the masses that we find an antidote for the poisons of socialism.

3. The spirit of partisanship. vs. 6–10. It was an adroit but very justifiable stroke of policy in Paul to thus make a powerful party in his favor by representing the whole question at issue as hinging on the doctrine of the resurrection. It was only the same grand argument that he used to the Corinthians. But the appeal seems to have roused on both sides not a desire to know the truth regarding Paul's guilt or innocence, but a spirit of the most intense partisanship. Men blindly devoted to a party, whether political or religious, can have no broad or just views. Their whole mental and moral vision becomes warped by surrendering to a clique or faction what they should hold as sacredly their own—the right of private judgment. This leads them to vote for unworthy candidates provided they can pronounce the same political shiboleth, and ignore the most righteous reform for fear it would hurt their party.

4. The cheering vision. v. 11. The best reward of a brave testifying for Christ is the opportunity for further and more heroic testimony. Promotion in the Christian warfare means harder fighting, fiercer foes, grander victotories. It was at Rome, not Jerusalem, that Paul could say triumphantly, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith."

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

Have the purest forgiven sinners any right to boast over the vilest? Rom. 11: 32. Does our Christian faith and hope hinge on the resurrection? 1 Cor. 15: 12–19. Why should we judge for ourselves in matters of right and wrong? Luke 12: 57; Rom. 14: 4, 5.

THE SCENE IN THE COUNCIL-ROOM.—Ananias, the high priest, was in the president's chair at the upper end of the hall. On one side of him were arranged the Pharisees, and on the other the Sadducees—the two rival sects. Among the Pharisees were the two sons of Gamaliel, Paul's old teacher. They had been fellow-students of Paul years before. They probably cherished the generous sentiments of their father who, twenty-four years before (A. D. 34), had the courage to advise, "Refrain from these men and let them alone, for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to naught; but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it, lest haply ye be found even to fight against God." (Acts 5: 38. 39).

On the other side among the Sadducees were the aged Caiaphas, the ex-high priest, who had procured the crucifixion of the Saviour, and the sons of that Annas who had joined with his son-in-law Caiaphas; and there was Theophilus, another ex-high priest, who had fostered the persecution against Stephen, and from whose hands Paul had received his commission to persecute at Damascus.

Paul entered as a prisoner the very hall where, twenty years before, he had helped to consign the martyr Stephen to his fate.—Peloubet.

PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS.

"To smite him on the mouth." To strike a speaker in the mouth is still a common Eastern mode of expressing dislike of his words. Our Saviour was thus treated when on trial before the same council (John 18: 22). The stroke is usually inflicted with the heel of a shoe; hence, "Give him the shoe," "Give him plenty of shoe," are well understood expressions.—Kitto.

"God shall smite thee, thou whited wall." These words are not to be understood as an imprecation, but rather as a prophetic denunciation of punishment, that his violent dealing would be returned on his own head.—Gloag. As it was a few years after, when at the beginning of the Jewish wars he perished in Jerusalem by the daggars of the Assassins.

"But when Paul perceived." St. Paul's appeal to the Pharisees against the Sadducees must not be understood as a mere device for securing his own safety. He had come to Jerusalem to reconcile the sincere Jews, if possible, to the Gospel as the fulfillment of the law. He desired to prove himself a faithful Israelite by his very testimony to him whom God raised from the dead. Both these objects might be promoted by an appeal to the nobler professions of the Pharisees, whose creed, as distinguished from that of the Sadducees, was still, as it had ever been, his own. Of that creed, faith in the risen Lord was the true fulfillment. He wished to lead his brother Pharisees into a deeper and more living apprehension of their own faith; and seeing now the hopelessness of gaining over the Sadducees, he made a last appeal to the party of which there remained any hope."—Smith's Student's N. T. Hist.

"Be of good cheer, Paul." Alford well notes the power of comfort which these words of the Lord possessed in in his subsequent experiences: (1) in the uncertainty of his life from the Jews; (2) in the uncertainty of his liberation from prison at Cesarea; (3) in the uncertainty of his surviving the storm in the Mediterranean; (4) in the uncertainty of his fate on arriving at Rome. So may one crumb of divine grace and help be multiplied to feed five thousand wants and anxieties.

There is a decrease of 338 reported in the ranks of the Royal Arch Grand Chapter of Illinois during the past year. There are 11,967 members yet to get out of the oath of bondage.

WHEATON COLLEGE.

"For Christ and His kingdom."

We had not long since the pleasure of listening to a seceding Royal Arch Mason. He is a minister and after fifteen years experience in the lodge came out and publicly renounced it. He has of course suffered somewhat for his fidelity to the truth, and his friends urged him not to come to the College at this time, as it would injure his business. He gave plain and unequivocal testimony to the truth of the revelations printed, and warned the students against all such secret combinations.

A FARM FOR SALE.

The College has an interest in the sale of an Indiana farm situated but little more than one hundred miles from Chicago. It is well fenced, well watered, and well timbered (between thirty and forty acres of good timber), has two good houses and outbuildings. It is well adapted to stock raising, grass or grain. There are one hundred and eighty acres in the farm and the price is seventy-five dollars per acre. If any of the readers of the Cynosure wish a safe and productive investment and at the same time to aid the institution, they can learn further particulars by application at the College.

PRAYER FOR COLLEGES.

There was held on Thursday, January 28th, a special service in the lecture room. The exercises were conducted by President J. Blanchard. Addresses were made by members of the faculty and students. Four young people professed to accept the Saviour. It was a good day much enjoyed by all. Will not the readers of this paper pray daily for this institution, its officers, students, patrons, friends? God has wonderfully planted, preserved, sustained it, and now it should be increased in means and men for the work of preaching the true Gospel in the ends of the earth.

OUR SPRING TERM

opens Tuesday, March 17th. Instruction is given in all the lines of college, academy and grammar school. The Conservatory of Music and the Fine Art department are well worthy of attention. We have so far as we know, the best instruction in these lines offered by any school in this vicinity outside of Chicago. There is no extra charge for instruction in German, elocution, book-keeping or penmanship.

All readers are respectfully invited to call and examine the school or to write for further information.

Address, PRES. C. A. BLANCHARD,
Wheaton, Ill.

—King Leopold of Belgium is contributing $400,000 a year to African missions out of his own private purse. Mr. Guiness, the missionary, recently asked him why he was so interested in Africa. His answer was: "You know God took away from me my son, my only son, and then he laid Africa upon my heart. I am not spending the revenue of Belgium on it, but my own private resources, and I have made arrangements that when I die this civilizing and evangelizing work in Africa shall go on."

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled coudition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruptiou, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws aud penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.
2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.
3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.
4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufaeture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.
5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.
7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.
8. We hold to and will vote for womau suffrage.
9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be prescrved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinameu.
10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.
11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.
12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.
13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.
14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.
15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1885.

THE ELMHURST, ILL., Eagle, and other local papers give their readers St. John's Topeka speech, a full page small close print. There is certainly a magic about this St. John. Now the third month after this speech has delivered; and in the fourth month after the election, this Topeka speech is being read by thousands. At a late speech in Evanston, though incidental and unexpected, the standing room in the hall was filled, and those who hear or read his speeches are insensibly, but steadily drawn towards him

THE Birmingham Free Press, Iowa, advertises the lodge meetings of its vicinity. Is there any other swindle, secret or open, which it would aid by advertising? lotteries or mock auctions, for instance?

"My people have been lost sheep; their shepherds have caused them to go astray, they have turned them away on the mountains; they have gone from mountain to hill: they have forgotten their resting place." —Jer. 50: 6.

Moore's New Masonic Trettle-board, long the liturgy of the Eastern lodges, gives as a reason for lodges being in the highest rooms, not only their greater privacy, but, "our ancient brethren built their altars on hill-tops, mountains and high places."

These "high places" in Judea were seats of idolatry and demon worship. They were also national brothels which made night hideous with their orgies. Yet they are claimed by this Masonic liturgy, as the "ancient brethren" of Masons. And they answer perfectly to the secret night-lodges of the present day. Christ is the "place of rest" to the soul. Having "all power in heaven and earth," he "saves to the uttermost," and these lodge-shams are worships of his rivals and antagonists.

INDIAN SUFFRAGE.—The Inter Ocean regards Gen. Crook's letter advocating the ballot for the Indian as "one of the most important letters of the season;" the more so, because Crook has been the "best Indian fighter in the service." The Indians outside of Alaska are estimated at 216,417. Gen. Croak says, the law against selling whiskey to the Indians "is a dead letter. Those only who cannot pay for it, are those who cannot get it." He thinks if the Indian had political status he would enforce the law prohibiting liquor selling to his tribe. Now he cannot.

THE ADVANCE gathers that Rev. J. W. Richards, Secretary of the Evangelical Lutheran Synod, throws suspicion on the orthodoxy of the 100,000 Free-church people in Sweden. Dr. Waldenstrom, whose soundness is doubted, has not yet left the Swedish State church, though he defends the seceders. He is Professor of Theology in the State school at Gefle; and he denies the hercsies imputed to him. The sect called Readers from which the Free churches are an outgrowth dates back thirty or forty years.

GEN. J. W. PHELPS.

The papers of Tuesday last noted briefly the unwelcome news that Gen. John W. Phelps died suddenly at his home in Guilford near Brattleboro, Vermont, on Sunday, February 1st. Mrs. Phelps was at the time absent on a visit. Gen. Phelps was born in Guilford in 1813, graduated at West Point, and served with distinction both in the regular and volunteer armies. He resigned his commission after the taking of New Orleans, while connected with the forces in the south-west. Shortly before this time he translated a French work against Freemasonry which was published at his own expense. The latest of his literary contributions was the translation from the French of the fables of Florian, published by John B. Alden, New York. Gen. Phelps was one of the most frequent and valued of the Cynosure contributors, writing over the name "American." He was also the author of the "Short Sermon" series. His only work published and for sale is "Secret Societies, Ancient and Modern," which appears in the N. C. A. catalogue. He was active in the National conventions of the N. C. A., contributing often valuable papers, and one year being elected president. In 1880 he was nominated for President by the American party and received the largest vote which had been cast by that party at that time. The reform has lost in his death one of its ablest and most zealous advocates.

THE SOUDAN DISASTER.

After the successes of the two divisions of Wolseley's army in the Soudan, the advance having communication with the steamers sent down the Nile from Khartoum, it seemed that the Soudan trouble was soon to be settled. Gen. Gordon in the latter city seemed to be entrenched strongly and able to maintain himself against the vast hordes of Arabs. The object of the expedition under Gen. Wolseley seemed to have been gained, and the way open for Gordon to withdraw from Khartoum if he desired. Such being the situation, England, and the whole world, indeed, was stunned with a new development in this most romantic campaign since the days of chivalry. Steamers sent up the Nile to Khartoum on the 28th of January, found that city and its defenses in the power of the rebels, and nothing could be learned of Gordon. The best report that could be obtained said that by means of emissaries within the city the Madhi had reduced the garrison to 2,500, who were overpowered by 60,000 Arabs Jan. 27th. It is yet hoped that Gen. Gordon, who is a man of great bravery and fertile in resources, has escaped up the Nile on the boats which he yet retained; or, even if he is fallen into the hands of El Madhi, that his great influence with the Arabs may yet prevail to secure his release or at least prevent his murder. That he has a foe of no ordinary character may be well understood from the reports that frequently reach us. An account of a great secret organization of terrible power and widely diffused membership among the Mohammedans of Africa has lately appeared in the London Standard and may be looked for in these columns next week. Another view of their character appears in the following from the Intelligencer, and may be better appreciated when we remember how Gordon has fought and routed the slave traders in years past:

"The Arabs, under the Mahdi, deserve no sympathy or pity. They are the cruel slave-traders of Central Africa, and it would be a great relief to the country if they should be severely punished and their power broken. A few weeks ago at a great anti-slavery meeting at Manchester, Mr. Stanley, describing a terrible slave raid by Arabs on the Upper Congo, about a year ago, said that, after passing through many miles of what had been on a former visit a fertile and populous country, he found nothing left but marks of fire and ruined villages. There were only a few survivors, who told him that a band of men, clothed as he was—in white cloth—and carrying hollow tubes that vomited fire, had come down from the north, shot down all the men that could not escape, and carried into captivity the women and children. Mr. Stanley supposed from the description that they must be Arab slave-hunters from the neighborhood of Khartoum; and this proved to be true. A day or two afterward he reached the spot where they were encamped. Boldly approaching the camp, he found there a body of three hundred fighting men, keeping in manacles and fetters two thousand three hundred naked women and children, their bodies emaciated and encrusted with dirt, having for food but a bunch of bananas or a load of cassava roots, such as a farmer's wife might throw into a pig-trough. It was like a ravening human kennel; a rancid effluvium of unwashed humanity filled the air, a meaningless chatter of wretched mortals filled the ears, and the eyes were satiated with extreme misery. Mr. Stanley calculated that the waters of the Congo would receive the corpses of very many, and that only some eight hundred, certainly not nine hundred, would reach their destination.

"The civilized world has reason to hope that Gen. Wolseley will be able to inflict such a defest on these Arabs as shall put it out of their power to make such slave raids for many years to come, until in fact the presence of European establishments and colonies along the Congo shall prevent such outrages for all coming time."

A NATIONAL DUTY.

The foreign relations of our government are receiving a severe scrutiny because of our participation in the Congo Conference. The House of Representatives has asked of the President why the United States is represented in a body whose deliberations concern the Eastern Continent alone. Secretary Frelinghuysen has replied, but the answer is hardly adequate to the case; and, if the Monroe doctrine is to be literally construed, a satisfactory answer is not easily made. But a more liberal and rational view of that doctrine is that foreign interference on our continent is not so much to be opposed, as that national independence and the perpetuation of peace among ourselves, to which foreign intervention is most inimical, are to be promoted. Perhaps at some future time the advice of European powers may help to secure these most desirable ends. At least, as a Christian nation, responsible for a great influence in favor of Christianity and civilization in every part of the world, the United States deserves a voice in the Conference, and the appointment of a representative by the President has by the result been proved an act of wisdom. The influence of America in favor of peace, of freedom for individuals and nations, of Christian civilization and religious liberty has been paramount. The croakers who object to our position in the Conference would make even more ado if we had not been invited to participate.

This leads naturally to the question of international arbitration, first advocated by the American party in a political platform, and by Charles Sumner and later by J. G. Blaine upon the rostrum. Allied to this is the proposition for disarmament suggested by Sumner after the Franco-Prussian war, and a few years ago by Bismarck himself. It goes without saying that this great and desirable result will never be reached until one of the leading nations either sets the example or secures the co-operation of other powers in seeking it. The policy of Gladstone and of the United States has been tending toward this end, and a closer alliance of the two nations ought to set it forward. That such an alliance is not improbable appears from the following editorial in the London Pall Mall Gazette, Feb. 3: "The American Republic is now, at last, beginning to have a foreign policy. The doctrine of complete isolation so long maintained by American statesmen has perished. Minister Kasson's presence and activity in the Berlin Conference on the Congo question must be taken as portent of things to come. America will continue to exert a great and increasing influence in the work of pacifying Africa. The republic will, ere long, claim admittance into European areopagus whenever dealing with questions pertaining to interests outside the boundaries of the European continent. England's duty, therefore, is to make the most of this great fact. Blood is thicker than water. The United States is England's natural ally. After the federation of the British Empire, there will remain for British statesmen no task comparable in importance to that of the conclusion of an alliance between Great Britain and tha great republic which sprung from England's loins.

—Bro. Hinman returned from the sonthwest in good health, and after a few days in this office started Saturday afternoon for Indiana, stopping to fill an appointment in the Swedish Lutheran church in South Chicago, over Sabbath.

—Secretary Stoddard reports only a local interest at the Massachusetts convention; and little probability that any comprehensive measures will be undertaken to carry forward the reform into the hearts of the churches during the year. Verily New England has not been set on fire yet so as to keep aglow.

—Joseph Cook began another course of his celebrated Monday lectures in Tremont Temple, Boston, last week, his subject being "Face to Face with Mormonism" This lecture will be widely reprinted and suitable extracts will be made for the Cynosure columns. We have also an illustrated exposition of Mormonism in preparation, to appear in a few weeks.

—Bro. W. B. Stoddard, the New York agent, reported on the 7th that the expositions held since the State convention, had been uniformly successful Every night except on the Sabbath had been occupied by Starry and Mallory. The towns of Forestville, Cattaraugus, Ellington and Jamestown had been visited. On Monday and Tuesday of this week they were to be at Gowanda, pushing on the battle against the lodge foe.

—Bro. Kelley, who expects to join Robert Shemeld and wife in their African mission, has been spending a few days in Chicago. He will join Bro. Shemeld in London in a few weeks; they will then go by way of the Red Sea to Zanzibar on the east coast of Africa and penetrate to the interior overland. The long journey will require some eight months' travel. Bro. Kelley held one or two conferences with Bro. Hinman, whose missionary experience on the West coast gave him useful information.

—Two or three years ago the Cynosure was criticized as unwarrantably severe in an editorial upon a funeral discourse by Elder Boring, then pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church in Wheaton. The occasion was the joint funeral of Mr. and Mrs. Wheeler, who had years before left the M. E. church and joined the Free Methodist brethren, because of the complicity of the former with the lodge. Elder Boring was an old acquaintance of Mr. Wheeler's and not long before his death the latter had spoken with sorrow of the Elder's affiliation with Masonry, and said he must remonstrate as a Christian with him. At the funeral the faithfulness of the two aged pilgrims, who in death were not divided, and their testimony against the lodge anti-Christ, were deprecated and misrepresented. Of this the Cynosure spoke faithfully. We have since learned that Elder Boring not far from the same time was engaged in advising young members of his church to join the Wheaton lodge!

THE MONUMENT AND THE MASONS.

Myron M. Parker, Grand Master of the District of Columbia is sending out his invitations to the Masons of high degree to come on to Washington, and "grace the occasion" with their graceless presence when the Monument is dedicated. But Pike and his crew must not expect to monopolize every such occasion at the expense of the nation, without protest.

The San Francisco Monitor says, in treating of Masonic dedications of public buildings:

"What has the Masonic body done to entitle it to public recognition above any other organization in the land? Its members push themselves forward into unseemly prominence on public occasions whenever their secret plotting secures their selection, but the masses of the people are beginning to suspect that this oath-bound secret association must have some ulterior motive in thus aggrandizing to itself all the public dedicatory ceremonies in the country. We never hear of Odd Fellows, Red Men, Foresters, or other secret organizations seeking to shut out citizens from taking part in public ceremonies where every citizen's contribution entitles him to some recognition, hence it is time that this Masonic arrogance should be checked. We thank Senator Sherman for having set his foot down upon this snake-in-the-grass society, and we hope his example will be followed by every State, county, city and town in the Union.

"The Masons bring bad luck to every enterprise they dedicate. They figured very prominently in the Bartholdi statue of Liberty in New York recently, and when the masses of the American people saw that it was to be a Masonic monument, they justly refused to contribute another cent towards its completion.

"It is a well known principle that secret societies always imperil the liberties of a people, especially when the members of a sect like the Masons persevere in antagonizing public opinion by systematically grasping at an ascendancy over all the other organizations of the country. Such a yearning for public recognition soon leads men to imagine that they are superior to their fellow citizens, hence they become hostile to every institution they do not direct, and jealous of public interference with what they begin to consider their sole private prerogatives.

"Here is where the 'danger' from Masonry is most to be apprehended, and the sooner public ceremonies are conducted by public servants the better will it be for the stability of the republic. The voices of ten millions of citizens of this republic protest against Masonic interference in any public function where the enterprise or institution is built by public contributions, and we hope the rebuke thus timely administered to this over-officious oath-bound body with bad antecedants, will have the effect of making them reserve their rediculous, impious and blasphemous rites for the halls of their secret lodges.

REFORM NEWS.

FROM THE GENERAL AGENT

Bro. John A. Conant grows stronger and more active in his opposition to the lodge and gin-mills as the years go by. Just now his thoughts and hands, as also the energies of his tasteful wife are occupied in adding the finishing touches to a new house they hope soon to occupy. The weather on the 28th was not favorable to a large gathering and only about thirty persons braved the storm on the slipperly pavements to spend the evening in Mission Hall where I spoke.

Of course I called on Miss Lizzie O. Smith, who is now in her fiftieth year of helplessness. This time she has lain upon her couch dependent as an infant on the ministrations of others and yet the promises of food and raiment have been verified so that she has lacked nothing. Hers has been a life of most remarkable faith, and her history one continued series of answers to prayer. Among others she gave the following instance of Masonic charity. Learning that an early friend had united with the Masons, she mailed to him a number of the Cynosure, marking an article which she thought specially suited to his case. Suspecting from whence the document came he returned it accompanied with a letter, begging her to remember that her father was a Mason, and what the order had done for his family, etc. She replied, "I know that my father was a Freemason, and I remember well what they have done for us. They simply paid for cutting the square and compasses on his tombstone after he was dead. "This and nothing more." No reply has been received, and although the old friend and Mason lives near, neither himself or wife have since called on their afflicted sister and the daughter of a "brother Master Mason" who died in good standing. This is MASONIC CHARITY in Willimantic.

STAFFORD, Jan. 30.—A flying call on Hon. Geo. Buck and lady at Putnam gave me renewed assurances of their friendship and willingness to sustain the truth in face of opposition. These friends find practical ways in which to express their interest in reforms. Sometimes by sending the Cynosure to destitute persons, but this time it is by a collection of anti-secrecy literature for the Putnam Public Library, where they have the promise that it shall have proper attention. Herein is a good suggestion which others might do well to consider. Bro. Buck favors colporteur work in Connecticut and is ready to contribute towards the support of an energetic, competent man. If a room can be had and suitable arrangements made I expect to speak at Putnam before leaving New England.

I am up here two and a half miles from Stafford Springs on a "rocky ridge," and to me the wonder is how human beings can force a living from such a soil. But the evidences of life and even thrift are abundant. I am to speak this afternoon in the Congregational church at Stafford village and hope to make the acquaintance of some of our co-workers here.

PALMER, Jan. 31.—My audience last evening was composed of substantial men and women, including pastors Vale, Congregational; McCune, M. E.; and Elder Bachelor, Baptist. My reception and treatment were very cordial and many expressed a wish to hear further of these things. Connecticut is an inviting field for colporteur work and the seed sown is already bearing fruit. J. P. STODDARD.

BRO. LOGGAN IN KANSAS.

MANHATTAN, Kan., Feb. 4, 1885.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Bro. R. Loggan has just left here, with no bodily bruises or hard words said against him, as far as I know; and it was not because he did not give Masonry a dark dress, put on with plain testimony and sound argument.

He came Saturday afternoon and we had no arrangements made, but secured a house and gave notice from the pulpits in town on Sabbath for lectures Monday and Tuesday evenings. The cold weather had broken, the snow was melting and by Monday night the moon rose late and the roads were very bad; but our kind sheriff (who is an I. O. O. F.) gave us the house free, lighted and warmed, and a small audience gave the strictest attention to two able and instructive lectures, which we regret were not heard by a larger number. But we hope seed was sown that will bring forth fruit. A few of us raised $7.50, and we parted, both parties well pleased with each other. H. S. LIMBOCKER.

AT SABETHA.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Last week our State agent, Bro. R. Loggan, visited this place and gave us three splendid lectures. The weather being very unfavorable our congregations were small, but attentive. Bro. Loggan is well posted and an able, convincing speaker, and will do good work in the cause of reform. We have nothing else very encouraging to write you from this place; darkness seems to have covered the land, and gross darkness the people. Wickedness is coming in like a flood and there is no standard being raised up against it. Christ plainly tells us that his church is the light of the world, and, "if the light that is in you be darkness how great is that darkness." Surely our gold is changed, our fine gold is getting very dim, for the great masses of the professed church, both priests and people, will plead for Baal and bow the knee to his altar and worship. Surely, if Jeremiah was here upon the earth to-day, he would find as great a cause for tears as when he cried out in the bitterness of his soul, "O that my head were waters and mine eyes a fountain of tears."

In looking over the whole field in the light of the Bible, I must confess that I am not very sanguine that all this chain of secret societies and devil worship will be put down only by the judgments of Omnipotence. JOHN THOMPSON.

INTERESTING REPORT FROM SOUTH CHICAGO.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—By invitation of the Rev. J. Vibelius, pastor of the Bethany Swedish Evangelical Lutheran church of South Chicago, I addressed his people Sabbath evening, Feb. 8th. The audience was large, including many who are members of secret societies, but all were most respectful and attentive while I spoke for an hour on the relation of the secret orders to the Gospel of Christ. The services were opened by a hymn, reading of the 8th chapter of Ezekiel and prayer, all in Swedish. I was introduced by Mr. H. Lynman, who as an ex-member of a secret order feels a deep interest in our work.

This church has recently had an experience in dealing with this question, which is most creditable to all concerned. Not long since a mutual benefit society was organized in South Chicago, of which a number of Swedes became members. It was supposed to be an open society, but the officers chosen were Masons and Odd-fellows, and soon it began to hold secret meetings and to assume the character of other secret orders.

This called for action on the part of the church and resulted in inducing the society to vote that all its meetings should be open and its records free to public inspection. H. H. HINMAN.

THE MONUMENT PROTEST.

SIXTY-SEVEN.

I saw the form for signers in the Cynosure, last week, concerning the Washington Monument dedication, and cut it out. Among all I asked to sign it only three refused: the first was a jack Mason; the second, a regular Mason; the third, a seceder. I got sixty-seven signers, and by a little effort could have got as many more; but owing to the shortness of time I thought best to send it in. If every Anti-mason who read the heading will send in as many names, Hon. John Sherman will be encouraged to hold out against the wicked power of Freemasonry which is threatening to ruin our country.—LEE HUMBERT, Lecompton, Kan.

FORTY-FIVE.

I have given our village of 150 voters a pretty thorough canvass for signers to this remonstrance, and have succeeded quite well, taking into consideration the fact that we have one Masonic lodge, one Odd-fellow lodge, and one post of the G. A. R. in town. I am glad at having the opportunity to remonstrate. May God bless you and your efforts.—D. D. GIBSON, Springville, Iowa.

HEART SICKENING.

Yes, no doubt Freemasonry wants to continue its usurpation, and be the chief actor and object at the Washingeon Monument dedication. Thus it has ever thrust itself into public notice on every possible occasion of any importance, welcome or unwelcome. This thing has become painfully irksom and monotonous. It is strange that such boasted intelligence and goodness should have no modesty, shame, or sense of propriety, but continue to glut an insatiable desire for notoriety. It is heart-sickening. Because it laid the corner-stone containing its deceitful emblems and lying pretentions, and beguiled Washington into its silly mummery, which he afterward abandoned, is not the shadow of a reason why it should be allowed to continue its nefarious practices.—S. H., Lecompton, Kan.

SENATOR SHERMAN.

I say, by all means that are honorable let us remonstrate. We will return our remonstrance to Washington. What kind of a man is Hon. John Sherman? Is he a Mason? Is he afraid of them?—S. B. DAVIDSON, Warrensburg, Mo.

Senator Sherman is a man of too calm and enlightened a judgment to approve the Masonic raid on the Monument, although he is a lapsed Odd-fellow. He greatly offended the Masonic representative who called on him about the ceremonies, refusing a place for the Freemasons, which would change the proceedings from a national to a private character.

MOST PROMINENT MEN.

Enclosed please find my list, full as you see, and could get many more should it be necessary. I have on my list some of the most prominent men in our city, and feel sure of our success.—JOHN GARDNER, Aurora, Ill.

TWENTY-FOUR.

Am glad I can contribute a drop to help swell this ocean, as I trust it will be, of remonstrance. May its mighty waves sweep away the "subterfuge, sham and despotism." God speed the right. Pastor Borg of the Swedish Lutheran church expects to send you a good list of names to-morrow or Monday.—R. CANNING, Galva, Ill.

TWENTY-ONE.

I send you 21 names on the remonstrance; would have sent a greater number, if the call had been earlier, giving more time. Give the craft no rest day nor night until it shall give way to the true light. G. S. ROBINSON, Princeton, Mo.

THE HOME.

MY SHIP.

Down to the wharves, as the sun goes down,
And the daylight's tumult, and dust, and din
Are dying away in the busy town,
I go to see if my ship comes in.

I gaze far over the quiet sea,
Rosy with sunset like mellow wine,
Where ships, like lilies, lie tranquilly,
Many and far—hut I see not mine.

I question the sailors every night
Who over the hulwarks idly lean,
Noting the sails as they come in sight,
"Have you seen my heautiful ship come in?"

"Whence does she come?" they ask of me,
"Who was her master, and what her name?"
And they smile upon me pityingly
When my answer is ever and ever the same.

"Oh, mine was a vessel of strength and truth,
Her sails were as white as a young lamh's fleece.
She sailed long since from thc port of Youth,
Her master was Love, her name was Peace.

And like all heloved and heauteous things,
She faded in distance and douht away;
With only a tremble of snowy wings,
She floated, swanlike, adown the hay.

Carrying with her a precious freight,
All I had gathered hy years of pain;
A tempting prize to the pirate Fate,
And still I watch for her back again.

Watch from the earliest morning light,
Till the pale stars grieve o'er the dying day,
To catch the gleam of her canvas white
Among the islands which gem the hay.

But she comes not yet—she will never come
To gladden my eyes and my spirit more;
And my heart grows hopeless, and faint, and dumb,
As I wait and wait on the lonesome shore.

Knowing that temptest, and time, and storm,
Have wrecked and shattered my beauteous bark;
Rank seaweeds cover her wasting form,
And her sails are tattered, and stained, and dark.

But the tide comes up, and the tide goes down,
And the daylight follows the night's eclipse,
And still with the sailors, tanned and brown,
I wait on the wharves and watch the ships.

And still with a patience that is not hope,
For vain and empty it long hath been;
I sit on the rough shore's rocky slope,
And watch to see if my ship comes in.

—Florence Percy.

EVIL READING.

Not a few periodicals, designed for "Boys and Girls," show organization of business upon the foundation of pleutiful capital and fiuished skill. Shreds of scientific information illustrated by competent artists, paragraphs of funny anecdote, caustic wit, innocent humor, harmless rhyme, with now and then a maxim of truth, or faet of history, or portrait of precocious scholar, are used to eonceal and garnish the chaff and poison of mind and soul. Far more is done than to obliterate the winsome simplicity and guilelessness of youth; far more than to render insipid the pure delights of home and the calm industries of life. These papers cunningly teaeh disobedience to parents, contempt of authority, trust to luck rather than labor, relish of vagrancy and adventure. They supply the vocabulary of vulgarity and ruffianism, of fraud, lie and lust. What demons in the guise of newspapers, pamphlet and volume, pillage and defile the land! They claim to give food and drink, but millions fatally find they give only garbage and venom.

One must abaudon civilization in order to escape these corrupted and corrupting issues. Their forerunners arc huge picturcs of crime, despair and death, defiling the walls and fences everywhere, alluring and training our youth to imitation. Eaeh new phase in the life of forger, libertine, burglar, gambler, prisoner or pirate is so depicted and emblazoned with captivating title, that the unsophisticated discover not its craft of iniquity, until taught by the handcuff of the cell, the gangrene of the brothel or the black cap of the scaffold. The devastating grasshoppers appear in the summer only; but the periodicals, thus announced, come every week, pandering to the itch of novelty and branding the reader in some new place. Here is in part the explanation of the morbid restlessness, frequent sullenness, and rebellious outbreaks of children; their intolerance of the tranquil and thoughtful Sabbath-school; their stratagems for absence from God's house, and their delayed, if not precluded, conversion. The dwelling that harbors such reading, cannot be peaceful and joyous; for the mind is feverishly stimulated; the lower passions are provoked into premature and baleful activity; and a deceitful glare is shed over the real world. It is impossible that one can become a Christian, while persisting in such reading; or a thinker; no, not a reliable mechanic or clerk, or chambermaid or cook.

We sometimes wonder at the stubborn infatuation with which a tenderly reared maiden mismates herself; or we are aghast at the ease with which she is lured to irremediable shame. We are perplexed by the half-grown boy's precocity in obscenity, eruelty or villainly. But herein is no secret. Papers and books have been busy instructors. They intoxicated the girl's imagination, mildewed her delicacy and made trifles change placcs with rcalitics and glories. They taught the boy the language of the bar-room and forcastle, the cock-pit and the gambler's den, with the names and uses of the tools of outlawry. He breathed insensibly the malaria of the theatre, and the frenzy of the gaming-table and lottery. He pored over the demoralizing confessions of convicts and felons.

He sat with the family at the daily board. Acquaintance deemed him a safe companion for their children; but God sees that his heart is rotten. The persistent waters of evil thoughts have long been unsettling the dyke of his character. They found a sandy seam. They killed the cement of foundation-stones. No one saw the oozing drops, or thc thread-like stream, though swelling day by day. Wait only a little! With the first freshet of temptation comes the catastrophe. Nothing can compensate one for tarnished purity; for diseased fancy. Many imagine that divine grace will in this life erase the footprints of the erroneous and depraved. They quote, "If the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." "If any man be in Christ Jesus, he is a new creature; old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new." These are gracious and grand truths; but can art restore the down on the peach; or efface the scar of the healed wound; or impart elasticity and strength to the iron bar once overstrained? Never!

So, God's grace makes the most that is possible with the material that it has. But when the mind has been the tramping-ground of untruth; when the sensibilities have bled and bled under the stabs of sin; when the imagination has become the despot of judgment and will; when the heart like Babylon, has been "a cage of unclean birds;" then there is disintegration, if not mutilation, of the moral texture.

In the life of Heaven, all things will be made new. There is "no spot or wrinkle, nor any such thing;" but here the outlines of the dire mischief remain. The prodigal has come home; but his face betrays. through its strange joy, the bronze and seams of his wandering and riot. It is very hard to keep out of the city its old denizens. Unlike the foreign foe they know the weak points of walls and the exact site of treasury and magazine. Many a mature Christian groans and weeps over the follies and transgressions of his youth; forgiven indeed, but persecuting him still like painful twinges in the limb that endured amputation; or like the lassitude of eonvaleseence, sharply reminding one of fracture or illness; these vile thoughts, which are his infirmity not his fault, remind him of "the hole whence he was digged." Therefore, let no friend of children, in hope of redeeming grace for them, belittle a bad book or leaflet. Once read by daughter or son, and without Christ's power as the instant antidote, the contagion is communicated. Needless conflicts with impurity are necessitated; and those children cannot be in the home, in society, or iu the church what they might have been, but for the depleting and defiling print.

Children at first sin ignorantly in their reading. Attracted by sprightly tales and startling pictures, which give vivid conceptions of persous and events very remotc from their sphere, they scarcely know just when they begin to play the hypocrite and liar: so subtle is their deterioration. Melancholy as is this sight, it is surpassed by another—the apathy of the parent and teacher, though knowiug that by a skillfully ramified system, the most specious errors, the most polluting pictures, with ensnaring descriptious, are blown, numerous as thistle-seeds and vengeful as cholera-germs, from the great cities to every village, with school and farm-house between. Who knows not that scarce oue tradesman in fifty will refuse a saleable newspaper or book, however vicious? Yet, how seldom do parents scrutinize those pages which engross their children! Father aud mother are befooled by thc fashion-plate, or music, or historical parade upon the first page; and turn no further: or if, perhauce, they beguile, with reading. an idle or weary hour, smile at the innocent extravagancies. But usually their frame is dull unconcern. The husband delegates responsibility to the wife; aud she, overtasked, dispirited and deeply glad of quiet, is not inquisitive as to its cause or cost.

Meanwhile, the boys and girls are reading, reading. Industrious Satan is plucking out from the soil of their characters the roots of honesty, temperance, virtue and truth, and lavishly scattering the prolific seeds of their tenacious and deadly opposites.—Rev. E. W. French, in the Christian Statesman.

READING THE BIBLE.

1. Read the Bible regularly, A good man of old says: "I have esteemed the words of his mouth more than my neccssary food." This is the true idea. The Bible is daily bread, to be taken regularly that the soul may grow thereby.

2. Read the Bible attentively. The meaning of the Bible is in the Bible. Unless he that reads gets the meaniug, it will do him no good. Hasty reading of a great many chapters at once is of no advantage. Read slowly, a little at a time, and think on what you read, and you will understand and remember it.

3. Read the Bible as God's book; not merely because father or mother wish you to read it, but for better reason—because God speaks to you in the Bible. Wheu I have seen a little girl run, her eyes sparkling with joy, crying, "O mother! here's a letter from father to me, for my name is on the outside," I always wish she might thus look on the Bible, for it is a letter from our Father in heaven. So feel and read, and you will not grow weary of the Good Book.

These few hints are enough for once. Will not our young readers remember them, and read every day with great attention, the Book of God? I love to see a child as I do sometimes, take her little Bible every morning and sit down to read a chapter, without waiting for any one to tell her to do it. This is a better habit than Willie's for he only read occasionally, and had to be reminded often of his duty. Read often, and love to read, children, and you will not forget it.—The Golden Lesson.

ROYAL COMPANIONSHIP OF GOOD BOOKS.

Nearly all our associations are determined by ehance or necessity, and restricted within a narrow circle. We cannot know whom we would, and those whom we know we eannot have at our side when we most need them. All the higher circles of human intelligence are to those beneath only momentarily and partially open. We may by good fortune obtain a glimpse of a great poet and hear the sound of his voice, or put a question to a man of science and be answered good humoredly. We may intrude ten minutes' talk on a eabinet minister, answered probably with words worse than silence, being deceptive; or snateh once or twice in our lives the privilege of throwing a bouquet in the path of a princess or arresting the kind glance of a queen And yet these momentary chances we covet, ana spend our years and passions and powers in pursuit of little more than these, while meantime there is a society continually open to us of people who will talk to us as long as we like, whatever our rank or occupation—talk to us in the best words they can choose, and with thanks if we listen to them. And this society, because it is so numerous and so gentle, and can be kept waiting round us all day long, not to grant audience, but to gain it—kings and statesmen lingering patiently in those plainly-furnished and narrow ante-rooms, our bookcase shelves—we make no account of that company, perhaps never listen to a word they would say all day long.

Now books of this kind have been written in all ages by their greatest men—by great leaders, great statesmen, and great thinkers. These are all at your choice, and life is short. You have heard as much before, yet have you measured and mapped out this short life and its possibilities? Do you know, if you read this, that you cannot read that—that what you lose to-day you cannot gain to-morrow? Will you go and gossip with your housemaid or your stable-boy, wheu you may talk with queens and kings, or flatter yourselves that it is with any worthy consciousness of your own claims to respect that you jostle with the common crowd for entree here and audience there, when all the while this eternal court is open to you, with its society wide as the world, multitudinous as its days, the choseu and the mighty of every place and time? Into that you may enter always; in that you may take fellowship and rank according to your wish; from that, once entered into it, you can never be outcast by your own fault; by your aristocracy of eompanionship there your own iuherent aristocracy will be assuredly tested, aud the motives with which you strive to take high place iu the society of the living, measured, as to all the truth and sincerity that are in them, by the place you desire to take in this eompany of the dead.—Ruskin.

GOOD MORNING.

Good morning! though a simple gift,
Has still a magic power;
'Tis as a cup of water passed
One in a needy hour.

Good morning! these two little words,
When clothed with Christian grace,
Bring such a wreath of happy smiles
Upon a friendly face.

The sweetness lasts through all the day,
When cheerful we begin;
The light and shade along life's way
Are nicely woven in.

Perchance a cloud may rise at noon
And dim the morning light;
Good afternoon will break the gloom
And bring a sweet good night!

THE ODD MINUTES.

Grandpa Bogardus had led the way to the library and rattled many papers and snapped some strings and inquired in haste for Clarice.

"I have a little favor to ask," said Grandpa Bogardus, polishing his glasses and looking, with twinkling eyes, at Clarice.

"What in the world can it be?" cried Clarice, breathlessly.

"I have a parcel which I want examined; it is rather bulky and will require time; what do you say to looking over it?"

"I think I should like it," replied Clariee, a little perplexed.

"That I cannot answer for: you may like it and you may not, but if we undertake a thing it is proper to finish it."

Grandpa Bogardus polished his glasses very hard, and looked inquiringly at Clarice.

"I might try."

"That sounds better, something better; but this thing requires time, patience, perseveranee, and I shall expect it to be completed if begun."

"Whatever can it be?" thought Clarice, gravely.

"I do not expeet it done in a day, but will expect you only to make use of your odd minutes; do you ever have odd minutes?"

"I never thought a bit about it, grandpa, dear; but I believe I do."

"Well, what do say about making a bargain, giving your odd minutes to me if I give something in return to you?"

"I cannot think what it all means?"

"I mean if you will take your odd minutes to look over the parcel, I will give you the contents of the parcel in exchange."

"Oh, how charming! Where is it? Is it here?"

"Stay; come here, little daughter; it will not be charming."

"Won't it, grandpa?"

"No; you will sometimes get tired, and many times find it dull work, and will plenty of times feel disposed to give up the bargain altogether."

"But I do not think I will if I once decide to carry it through."

"No, you must not; that is it. Think about it, and if you decide to undertake it, carry it through. The New Year is the time for making stout resolutions, but the great thing is to keep to them."

"Dear grandpa, won't you show me the parcel?"

"Yes, for I want to let you see what I think can be done by saving some of the odd minutes of a year."

So Grandpa Bogardus led Clarice to an alcove where the porter had deposited the parcel, and there, in the richest bindings, were twelve books—a course of profitable historical reading in such beautiful type and covers that Clarice exclaimed in delight:

"Grandpa! Grandpa dear! you cannot mean them all for me,"

"They are mine until you have earned them. There is one for each month in the year: portion so many pages to each day, and you will find how many odd minutes you will have in which you can read a few pages at a time. At the end of each month, if you have won the book, I will write your name within it."

"But, grandpa, I never could do it; I never read such books in my life; they are very grave and large." Clarice was glancing through them.

This house is large; it could not have been built in a day, but it was finished a stone at a time; you will read but a page at a time when you have an odd minute. There are a great many odd minutes in a year."

"But would I like them; I mean, would I understand them, grandpa dear?"

"The more you read, the better you will understand them and the better you will like them."

"But I could not get through them: four hundred pages! five hundred pages!—it would take me a year to read one."

Clarice shook her head despairingly.

"Did you ever read twenty-five pages a day?"

"Yes, more than twenty-five pages of story books, but"—

"But—these will be useful and will require some resolution; yet it is an easy task; one page at a time; a few pages every day."

"I will do it, grandpa dear;" said Clarice, thoughtfully, and grandpa knew that a small battle had begun between Clarice and idleness, between Clarice and the evil habit of wasting time.

Clarice began that very day to use up the odd minutes; she was surprised to find so many: but some of the pages were hard to understand, some of the pages were fearfully dry after the brightness of stories; sometimes she was half inclined to give up; she would look at the twelve books and sigh. However, she came to the conclusion to put eleven away entirely out of sight and think only of the one page at a time; then she got along better, and Grandpa Bogardus was not a little pleased in February when he wrote his name in the first book.

So Clarice examined Grandpa Bogardus's parcel to the end, and found it pretty hard work sometimes; but who could guess how much wiser and brighter she grew by the proeess, how much easier she found it to finish the last books than it was to finish the first; how much easier to understand the last pages, and how much she had really gained, not only in actual information, but by forming a good habit, in consequence of her New Year resolve to use up the odd minutes?—Selected

BOOKS MADE OF CLAY.

Far away beyond the plains of Mesopotamia, on the banks of the river Tigris, lie the ruins of the aneient city of Nineveh. Not long sinee huge mounds of earth and stone marked the place where the palaces and walls of the proud capital of the great Assyrian empire stood. The spade, first of the Frenehman, then of the Englishman, has cleared all the earth away, and laid bare all that remains of the old streets and palaces where the princes of Assyria walked and lived. The gods they worshiped and the books they read have all been revealed to the sight of a wondering world. The most curious of all the eurious things preserved in this wonderful manner are the clay books of Nineveh.

The chief library of Nineveh was eontained in the palace of Konyunjik. The elay books whieh it eontains are composed of sets of tablets covered with very small writing The tablets are oblong in shape, and when several of them are used for one book, the first line of the tablet following was written at the end of the one preceding it. The writing on the tablets was of course done when the clay was soft, and then it was baked to harden it. Then each tablet or book was numbered, and assigned to a place in the library with a eorresponding number, so that the librarian eould readily find it, just as our librarians of to-day number the books we read.

Among these books are to be found eollections of hymns (to the gods), descriptions of animals and birds. stones and vegetables, as well as history, travels, etc., etc. Perhaps those little Ninevite children of long ago took that delight that young readers now do in stories of birds. beasts, and insects of Assyria.

The Assyrians and Babylonians were great students of astronomy. The method of telling time by the sun, and of marking it by the instrument ealled a sun dial, was invented by the latter nation. None of our modern clocks and watehes can be be eompared to the sun-dial for accuracy. Indeed, we have to regulate our modern inventions by the old Babylonian one—Harper's Young People,

TEMPERANCE.

FIRMNESS OF SENATOR WILSON.

Senator Henry Wilson was a self-controlled as well as a self-made man. He left his New Hampshire home early in life, and changed his name in order to get out from under the baleful shadow of intemperance. He began on the lowest round of the social ladder, and climbed up, rung by rung, until he became a political power in the nation.

The first step he took in the ascent placed him on the pledge never to drink intoxicating liquors. The second step he took made him an industrious laborer, the third a diligent reader.

He was sent to Washington to carry a petition against the admission of Texas into the Union. John Quincy Adams asked him to a dinner party, where he met with some of the great men of the nation. He was asked to drink wine. The temptation to lay aside his temperance principle for a moment, in order not to seem singular, was a strong one. But he resisted it and declined the glass of wine. Mr. Adams commended him for his adherence to his convictions.

After Mr. Wilson was elected to the United States Senate, he gave his friends a dinner at a noted Boston hotel. The table was set with not a wine glass upon it.

"Where are the wine glasses?" asked several, loud enough to remind their host that some of his guests did not like sitting down to a wineless dinner.

"Gentlemen," said Mr. Wilson rising and speaking with a great deal of feeling, "you know my friendship for you and my obligations to you. Great as they are, they are not great enough to make me forget 'the rock whence I was hewn and the pit whence I was dug.' Some of you know how the curse of intemperance overshadowed my youth. That I might escape I fled from my eariy surroundings and changed my name. For what I am, I am indebted, under God, to my temperance vow and my adherence to it.

"Call for what you want to eat, and if this hotel can grovide it, it shall be forthcoming. But wines and liquors cannot come on this table with my consent, because I will not spread in the path of another the snare from which I have escaped."

Three rousing eheers showed the brave Senator that men admired the man who had the courage to honor his convictions.—The Christian.

A VICE PRESIDENT DRUNK.

Perhaps the most disgraceful scene in our history as as a republic was the day of Lincoln's second inauguration, when Andrew Johnson, the Vice President elect, made a maudlin drunken speech before the leading men of this Nation and the representatives of nearly every foreign nation of prominence. An old Senator told me to-night how this came to be. Said he: "Andre Johnson was accustomed to drinking, but he seldom took more than he could conveniently and sensibly carry. While Governor of Tennessee he used to keep a bottle of whisky in a covered washstand in his office, and I have taken several drinks with him there He would raise the cover, take a drink, and offer one to me. Still this was a eommon custom in the South, and Johnson was not looked upon as a drinking man in Tennessee: I do not think he often took more than enough for himself at Washington.

"As for his drunkennesss at his inauguration, to which Sumner of sarcastically alluded on the Senate floor. John W. Forney told me how it occurred. Forney was clerk of the Senate at the time. He said that Johnson had been drinking the night before the inauguration with a lot of friends atthe Me tropolitan Hotel, and, as is usual in such cases, he arose the next morning with a bad taste in his mouth and no appetite. The result was that he started up to the Capitol without breakfast, and when he got there he was very weak, and he looked wan and haggard. He came into the Senate and asked Mr. Forney if he could get him a drink of whisky. Forney replied yes, and went out and brought in a bottle of old Kentucky bourbon. Johnson took this and poured a goblet half full, while Forney's eyes grew large as he gulped it down.

"This amount would have been enough to make an ordinary man drunk, but it was not enough for Viee President Johnson. He filled the glass half full again, and threw it in upon his empty stomaeh. He then walked off across the room, and he only staggered a little as he took his place beside President Lincoln in front of the assemblage of Cabinet Secretaries, Foreign Ministers, and others. When it came time to take his oath and the book was handed him to kiss he waived it aside with his hand and began make a speech.

"What he said was never reported in the papers, but it must have been very funny. He took each of the secretaries to task and gave them instructions. He addressed the Foreign Ministers, and though Forney tried to pull him down by holding to his coat tails behind, he would not stop, but went on. President Lincoln was, as were all the Americans present, grieved by the occurrence, and Abe Lincoln said: I hope this will prove a lesson to Andy.'"—Washington Correspondence Cleveland Leader.

THE CHURCHES.

—The day of prayer for colleges was observed as usual at Wheaton with special meetings, in which several students were converted. There is a manifest and happy religious interest in the college from which more good results are expected.

—The series of meetings in the French Mission in this city were cut short somewhat by the sickness of Father Chiniquy. He has, however, returned to the city and will resume the meetings in Maskell Hall next week.

—Mr. Moody's meetings at New Brunswick, N. J., Jan. 26 and 27, were attended with their usual interest. At one of the meeting a special address was given to the students of Rutger's College, among whom a deep religious interest was awakened. There are plain indications of an extensive revival.

—Bro. C. W. Hiatt of the Oberlin Seminary, is preaching this year at Norwalk, Ohio. He reports a general revival spirit in the place affecting all the churches, which are holding separate protracted meetings. Some twenty conversions in the Congregational church are a cause of great rejoicing.

—It is understood that the Supreme Court of Michigan decided, Jan. 14th, that the church property at Holland, the ownership of which has been contested for some time in the courts, belongs, to the majority party which decided to withdraw from the General Synod because of the Masonic affiliation of the latter.

—Dr. Cullis of Boston, called a meeting last week of all Christians, with this object: "For the purpose of studying God's Holy Word, and thereby encouraging one another in the faith of the Lord Jesus; that we may lift up the standard for holy living, that we may be 'followers of God, as dear children,' 'unto all pleasing.' Let us pray for the baptism, Holy Ghost, to unite our hearts."

—E. A. Goodnow, of Worcester, has pledged the sum of $10,000 to the Huguenot Seminary of South Africa.

—A complete list of the Christian missionaries at work in China shows that there are 387 male and 420 female missionaries, with 1,311 native helpers and 24,607 communicants. They are connected with sixteen British, four Continental and thirteen American Societies.

—The General Missionary Committee of the Methodist Episcopal church at its last session appropriated $5,000 to open a mission in Corea. The Rev. W. B. Scranton, M. D., had been appointed missionary and will spend the winter in Japan.

—The annual Day of Prayer for Colleges was established in 1823. Observed for more than threescore years, it has become firmly fixed in the devotion of both church and college. The observance, at first made on the last Thursday of February, has been fittingly transferred to the last Thursday of January.

—One hundred Chinese young men, partly educated in the United States, but recently recalled, are now at work in China. As they are in government employ, they have to be most careful about offending native religious prejudices, but it is hoped that they will be able to gather many children into Sunday-schools in the future. They are most anxious for all kinds of Christian and religious aid; and one of them, Quong King Yung, makes a special request, through the Foreign Sunday-school Association, for sermons and Bible commentaries.

—Rev. Joel Martin of the Wesleyan church is hoping to publish a paper to meet the needs of the connection in Michigan. The paper will be published if five hundred subscriptions are received, at fifty cents a year, by the middle of February.

—A circular recently issued by the Young Men's Christian Association gives some valuable statistics, showing the outcome of the efforts made by the Association in behalf of college students. There are now 181 associations in as many colleges. Of the 37,000 students in the colleges, one-third are Christians, and a majority of the latter members of the association. In response to the prayers and efforts of these Christian students, 1,700 other students professed conversion before the end of last year; 2,119 are candidates for the ministry, and of these eighty-three have been converted since entering the college; 182 intend to be foreign missionaries, seven of these having been converted since entering college.

THE COMMISSION ON NATIVE MISSIONS.

It is probably known to most of the readers of the Cynosure that there was organized an association with the above title some little time since. The special purpose of the society is to aid persons belonging to non-English speaking races in preaching the Gospel to their countrymen. During the last year we have been assisting Rev. G. H. Filian who was born at Antioch and graduated from the special course in Chicago Theological Seminary. He is laboring in Talas, near Cesarea in Asia Minor, and the letter from him which is subjoined, will, we think, be interesting to all who are interested in the progress of the Redeemer's kingdom.

There is also a letter from Dr. Avedis of Cesarea which reads like a chapter from the Acts of the Apostles. Our Commission has voted for the present year to aid Bro. Filian, and if we can do so, to send assistance to Dr. Avedis as he may require. His letter we are sure will be intersting reading to all Christians.

It seems hardly to need argument to satisfy any observer that the church is spending far too large a percentage of her income on home work; that believers spend too freely for themselves and too carefully for God. With eight hundred millions of heathen about us, with all the world open to the Gospel, and with our professed faith that probation ends with life, we sit at our ease while the waves of sin and death sweep on, engulfing a generation every forty years. Dear friends, please read these letters, and without cutting on other departments of the Lord's work send to Mrs. L. H. Plumb, Streator, Ill., a contribution for this work. In this connection I may say that a friend in Tarrytown, N. Y., has recently sent ten dollars to the work of the Lord near Berea, Kentucky. In hope of the Gospel.

CHAS. A. BLANCHARD.

BRO. FILIAN'S LETTER.

TALAS, Cesarea, Turkey, Dec. 23, 1884.

Pres. C. A. Blanchard,

MY DEAR PASTOR:—About two months ago I wrote to you a letter from the city of Yozgat, where I staid about three Sabbaths in returning from the Central Turkey Union. In that same letter I described to you the good and great work there.

After my return here I wrote you another letter in which I offered my thanks also for the 1,000 francs kindly sent to me by Mrs. Plumb.

Now I am happy to write to you this letter again, even I am happier to write it because the work of the Lord is much better here than ever before. The Lord is working mightily and is prospering us more than we can hope. Our prayer meetings are very interesting. There are about 150 persons present in each prayer meeting time. The brethren get up and speak and pray earnestly, though the ladies have no permission to speak and pray because we are in a cursed land; but they are permitted to offer hymns, to repeat verses from the Bible and to sing, and they have their own especial prayer meetings in different houses every week.

We have another meeting on week days which we call the Spiritual Discussion Meeting. In that meeting we have about two hundred persons and every body has a right to discuss the question. For instance last Friday evening this was the question, Is salvation by the works or by the faith? One party discussed the works and another the faith. All argument was from the Bible. I like to have the people searching the Bible in this way. Everyone who attends this meeting is searching the Bible, and there are not only Protestants but Greeks and Armenians.

Last Sabbath we had the Holy Communion, the Fellowship. We invited the pastor of Cesarea, Rev. Kerope Yacobian, and Rev. Dr. Farnsworth, a missionary. We had four baptisms and nine new members who joined the church, six of them gentlemen and three ladies. There were about four hundred persons in each service of the day. All of us were full of joy to receive these new members to the church of God. Five gentlemen and one lady were Greeks and two ladies and one gentleman Armenians.

The majority of my congregation are Greeks; one whom we received belongs to a rich family. He is a strong, smart young man about 35 years of age, full of faith and love to Christ. He is severely persecuted by his father, mother, relatives and friends. We are to have an especial prayer meeting for these new members of the church. Will you not pray for them? The last communion we received eight and now nine, making seventeen in all since my coming. They are all standing well. * * * *

Yours in Christ, G. H. FILIAN.

Dr. Avedis, whose letter follows, is said by Dr. Van Lennep to be a man of most excellent character and ability, thoroughly reliable in every respect.

LETTER FROM DR. AVEDIS.

CESAREA, Sep. 25, 1884.

You are aware that about fifteen years ago I gathered a large congregation to whom I used to preach the simple truths of the Gospel, enlightening and calling men to repentance, but not separating them from their mother church.

A few years ago on my return from the United States, after my graduation as a doctor, I took up again this my former work of preaching the Gospel to the people, while at the same time preaching and supporting myself by my profession. The work grew as time passed on and extended its roots wider and deeper. Our association as you know, not bearing the name Protestant, did not frighten the people away from our meetings, and no one would dare to insinuate that we were denying the faith of our fathers.

During this time many and many hearts were won to the truth, and our congregation was greatly enlarged. We started also Thursday evening meetings, and at these meetings we began to sing national hymns and airs. This interested and pleased the Armenians very much, and they attended our meetings in such numbers that we could not accommodate them. In order to accommodate more we had to remove the benches from the room, and let the people sit closely together on the carpet. This arrangement was most uncomfortable for the people, especially in warm weather; yet they were so eager to hear the Gospel that they willingly bore the discomfort. Thus, though amid hardships, the Word of God was preached, and multitudes were brought into the light. It was painful, however, to see hundreds often turned away at the door for want of room, as with all our crowding we were only able to accommodate about eight hundred, or one thousand at the utmost.

Seeing the eagerness of the people to hear the Gospel preached, we contrived a plan to hold "neighborhood meetings." We divided the city into eight districts and held our meetings five nights in the week in each of the districts. In these meetings both men and women were allowed to read the Scriptures, pray and speak in public. Our meetings were greatly blessed, and the whole city seemed awakened, and the influence of the Gospel, spreading like sheets of fire, burned up all that was not the truth of God.

The ecclesiastics became at last alarmed, fearing they would lose their influence over the people if a stop were not put to this remarkable awakening, and word was sent to me to close our places of meeting, which I called "Gospel school-rooms.' I did not obey the order, but continued to preach. I was then accused before the Governor as being a disturber of the peace, etc., and if I was not banished from the city much blood would be shed. Consequently I was imprisoned, and the same night secretly carried out from the city by ten policemen—not even being allowed to send word to my wife and children.

The Governor of Antioch, the place to which I was exiled, did not dare to imprison me, because the English Consul protested that there should be no persecution on account of religion. I was, therefore, given my freedom, but was not allowed to return to Cesarea. After being detained at Antioch seven months, and fearing that I would be kept there indefinitely, I quietly ran away, and returned to Cesarea. The first Sabbath after my return I preached to a large congregation from the text "Woe unto me if I preach not the Gospel." About this time the Governors, both of Cesarea and Antioch, were changed, and my accusers could not agree among themselves—and the simple Gospel is still being preached, and the people through these humble efforts are becoming enlightened.

One result of my persecution has been that the Gospel has become a theme for discussion among the people at large, and the Greeks and Armenians themselves are attempting to open places for preaching in imitation of my own. In order to prevent the women coming to our meetings the priests are starting classes for them to study the Bible.

My adversaries, seeing they could not stop my work by exiling me, are now hoping to accomplish their end by trying to prevent me from earning my living by my medical practice, and I fear that they may succeed in their efforts to starve me out. Pray, my dear friend, that whatever may be my fate, the word of God may have an abundant success, to the salvation of multitudes now sitting in darkness.

FARM NOTES.

MORE BRAIN-POWER ON THE FARM.

About the best use a farmer can make of himself is, to devote the present long winter evenings to an increase of his mental activity. Farms differ in their productiveness, mainly accordlng to the amount of intelligence that is brought to their cultivation. Brain-power may be increased by a thorough knowledge of the present condition of the farm, and its worth as a machine for making money. What crops have paid, and what have been raised and sold at loss? What per cent has it paid on the capital invested? In the case of the gain, what secured it? Was it the manure applied, or the frequent tillage, or the extra amount of rainfall? In case of loss, was it the want of fertilizers, was the crop choked by weeds, or was the seed poor, and the crop damaged by late planting? This accounting for failure is as profitable as bragging over big crops, without making any record of the process of obtaining them. Brain-power may be increased by planning improvements. There may be several acres of peat-swamp or bog meadow, producing only brush and bog hay, hardly worth cutting. There is a good outlet, and it can be drained three feet or more deep. Cipher out the cost of drainage, and of making it produce three tons of clover or timothy to the acre. Would not the sight of the waving heads of the grass be more pleasing than the cat-tails, flags, and skunk cabbages, that now waste their sweetness upon the desert air? There may be an acre of swale, underlaid with hard-pan, over which ferns, weeds, and aquatic grasses run riot during the whole summer. Is it not time the bottom was knocked out of it, by tiles laid three or four feet in the ground, and the superfluous water compelled to go out through these instead of creeping lazily over the surface?—Agriculturist

A NEW AND STRANGE STORY BASED ON STARTLING FACTS, VIVIDLY PORTRAYING A MYSTERIOUS AND DANGEROUS POWER AT WORK IN THE GOVERNMENT, THE CHURCH, AND THE HOME.

"A book which we trust may have a wide circulation."—National Baptist, (Philadelphia.)

"Unless we are greatly mistaken, the work will do more to awaken the American church and people to the evils of Freemasonry than any other book recently published."—Evangelical Repository.

Sign for the Honor of Washington.

The Washington Monument is to be dedicated February 22, 1885, and the rites of the Masonic Lodge—though once excluded—are to be performed by permission of the Congressional Committee, because, it is said, the corner stone was laid by the order. This distinction should never be given, because:—

1. Two wrongs do not make one right.

2. The monument is National, built with the Nation's money. Its dedication is a National event, and should be National and American, not the affair of a sect, secret or open.

3. The Masonic Lodge has no more right to such distinction than the Hibernians, or any other secret order; or than the Episcopalian, Presbyterian, or any other ecclesiastical society.

4. The stone sent by the Pope for the monument was broken up and thrown into the Potomac without explanation or word of regret. Why are the Catholics snubbed, and the Freemasons honored?

5. Freemasonry is of foreign birth, entirely un-American and unrepublican. Its public displays are pompous and barbaric. Its titles are extravagant and lordly. Its constitution is despotic. Its oaths are extra-judicial, which Webster said should be suppressed by law.

6. Freemasons claim Washington as a member; but he left them in 1768, while yet a young man; never presided in the lodge, and did not wish to be addressed even as a private Mason. This is proved by his letters and the records of the Pennsylvania Legislature of 1837. In his Farewell Address he speaks of organizations which exhibit the character of Freemasonry as destructive of the fundamental principle of liberty, and "of fatal tendency," "likely in the course of time and things to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious and unprincipled men will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reigns of government."

Remonstrance.

To HON. JOHN SHERMAN, Chairman of Congressional Committee on Washington Monument:

The undersigned respectfully protest against the arrangement granting the performance of Masonic rites at the dedication of the Washington Monument, and pray that your Committee will allow only such ceremonies as are National in their scope and American in their character.

May it prove a blessing in this, and be a great power in the work of overturning the greatest evil that ever cursed our nation, and which does more than any other agent in hindering us from becoming a Christian Nation.

MAGNIFICENT BUILDINGS.

The new Board of Trade building in Chicago is among the grandest buildings in the city and probably there is no commercial structure equal to it in the country if in the world. It stands directly in the line of LaSalle street, between Jackson and Van Buren streets, the very street having to give way to the vastness of its dimensions. Close by it stand the Grand Pacific Hotel, the Government Building, the Rock Island and Michigan Southern depot, the Open Board Building, and half a dozen of the finest new office buildings in the city. In fact this grand architectural pile is fast drawing around it a new business center.

The dimensions of the structure are 174 feet front on Jackson street by 225 feet in depth, running back half way to Van Buren street. The main portion of the building is nine stories in height, or over 100 feet, while the tower parts the clouds 300 feet above the sidewalk. It is solid masonry for 250 feet; then iron, surmounted by a beautiful vane representing a full-rigged schooner tacking against the wind. This is a change from the original design as represented in the cut. The main hall in which the bulls and bears will soon congregate to bellow and growl is 152x162 feet, and nearly 100 feet in height. It is nearly as large again as the hall in the old building. The new building is principally of stone, with high arches and massive carvings. The interior is finished in various hard woods, and there are numerous gorgeous stained glass windows. In the tall tower swings the mammoth bell, weighing over six tons, and on which the great tower-clock will strike the hours. This bell and clock are the largest in the city.

In our limited space we cannot enter into a full description of the palatial edifice; suffice it to add that its total cost when fully completed and ready for dedication about the first of May will be close on to $2,000,000. As compared with this it will be interesting to know the cost of some of the other principal structures in Chicago. The total cost of the Government building, which occupies an entire square, including remodeling and repairs to date, has been $5,907,958.

The county building cost $2,320,772, and the new city hall $1,591,973. These two structures are almost exact counterparts and occupy the whole square bound by Washington, Randolph, Clark and La Salle streets. The cost of the Palmer House, the most expensive hotel building in the city, is usually stated at about $2,000,000

What about commas? In a recent number of "Knowledge" there is a keen contest as to the use and abuse of commas. How few men there are who recognize that punctuation is largely a personal matter. Roughly speaking, it is the expression of a man's own individuality. One man will shower the commas down on his copy like hailstones, whilst another appears to forget that commas have any existence. The grammarian, pure and simple, is always on stilts, and shakes his head in despair at the lapses which occur in Byron, Shakespeare, and every other other great writer. He forgets that the higher subtleties of thought transcend as rules, and he should remember that the man who is conspicuous for the perfection his grammar has usually very little to say. There is one golden rule with respect to commas; that is, the fewer the better. Close, compact thought lends itself readily to clear utterance, and in all such cases commas only tend to confuse.

All feeders who have studied the habits of the animals they feed, have discerned that they take special note of time, and are disappointed if the time is delayed only a few minutes. It is a cardinal point to observe great regularity in time and quantity in feeding sheep. It has been observed that a careful and regular feeder will produce a better result with inferior food, given at equal times and in even quantity, than an irregular feeder as to time and quantity with the best quality of food. It is said "the master's eye is worth two pairs of hands," and it may be as truly said that the shepherd's eye, which takes note of the individual wants of his flock, is worth a large amount of carelessly given food.

Guizot's CELEBRATED ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF France

REDUCED IN COST from $33.00 to $8.00, or comparing contents fairly, from $49.50 to $8.00, for the only other American edition of GUIZOT comes down TO The French Revolution, only, and is continued to Napoleon III. by MARTIN, and $49.50 is the published price of the two works. THIS ILLUSTRATED LIBRARY EDITION covers from the earliest times to 1848, is written by M. GUIZOT, Prime Minister of France, and completed from his notes by his daughter, Madame GUIZOT DE WITT. It is published in 8 volumes, small octavo, printed from the type shown by these lines, contains the 426 Illustrations, mostly full-page, of the imported edition, is bound in tasteful Library style, dark green cloth, beveled boards, gilt tops. Price of the set, only $8.00 by express, or, sent prepaid for $9.60.

"There is only ONE DRAWBACK. . . it seems more like getting a present than making a purchase. Guizot is the most brilliant of French historians, as well as the most to be relied upon. He is the Macaulay of the history of France; his style and treatment are philosophical, didactic, rich in detail, dramatic in arrangement. His narrative is full of emotion, like a quick stream; his characters rise before us as in the flesh; they are men and women, not historic lay figures. It is as charming as any romance, and the interest is permanent. It is a work to keep and read and re-read for years."—Dominion Churchman, Toronto, Canada.

"In ENGLISH, at least, original or translated, we have NO WORK of French history that CAN APPROACH IT. We can name no work that gives the complete history, and gives it from the pen of a master, that can be thought of as a rival to the mammoth production of Guizot. How Mr. Alden can give the eight volumes, and this on good paper, and clear type, including the multitude of illustrations, is a thing we have CIPHERED over, but we fail to understand it. The first volume gives substantially the beginnings of French history. It is of necessity the dullest of the eight, yet with Guizot even logarithms would be readable."—Christian Leader, Boston, Mass.

"The MARVELOUS CHEAPNESS of these profusely illustrated and handsomely bound volumes must provoke comment everywhere. Each volume is easily worth $2.00, according to the standard of prices asked. This is the only complete American edition of this work, which is known as the best popular history of France."—Journal, Indianapolis, Ind.

"In the reproduction of this work the publisher has outdone all previous efforts, and has given us a MARVEL of EXCELLENCE, in every respect, at a marvel of cheapness."—Christian at Work, New York.

The Facts Stated.

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt. William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribes his NAME to the letter, but ATTACHES HIS AFFIDAVIT to it.

In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influence of "secret societies."

The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

WEBSTER'S PRACTICAL A NEW DEPARTURE IN DICTIONARIES.

An Industrial Revolution.—In a large Connecticut manufacturing establishment there is in operation a new style of furnace which produces more steam-power from a consumption of 1,000 lbs of coal than can be generated from 20,000 lbs burned in the ordinary way. In other words, the new contrivance already saves nineteen-twentieths of the fuel, and it is believed that before being publicly announced it will be so improved that the saving will reach 49 fiftieths! The facts already developed are simply incredible to one who has not actually seen them verified.

A Remarkable Coincidence.—While the new Furnace was in process of construction, the editors and publishers of Webster's Unabridged were engaged upon their new work which is as great an improvement upon all previous Dictionary productions, and just as valuable in its way as is the incredible fuel economizer above alluded to. Webster's Practical is not only a new compilation by the leading Dictionary House of the world, but it embodies several new features which, for ordinary use, render it pre-eminent among dictionaries—not excepting even the Unabridged.

1st, Condensation—By grouping all derivative and compound words under their root or leader (as in the "Book" example quoted below), such words are adequately treated in one-third of the space required by the old arrangement. By this means nearly all the desirable material of the four and five-dollar dictionaries is presented in a convenient and handy form in Webster's Practical.

2d, Association.—We comprehend as well as remember things chiefly by their associations. For this reason any one who shall carefully read the "Book" paragraph which we reproduce from Webster's Practical Dictionary, will not only comprehend it more readily, but will be able to remember two or three times as much as would be gained by reading about the same words when treated separately as in other works.

3d, Ready Reference.—Not only do we comprehend and remember more readily by the new grouping method, but we do it in less than a fourth of the time required when the words are classified in the old way. Hence, no one who values time would hesitate to pay one dollar for Webster's Practical rather than accept the best of the older dictionaries as a gift.

4th, Derivative Terminations.—Only the larger dictionaries hitherto published give the derivative terminations. The New American Dictionary, for instance, does not give any of the four variations of so common a word as forbear, while they are all given in Webster's Practical.

5th, The Illustrations in Webster's Practical are more numerous and better executed than those of any other abridged or low-priced dictionary.

6th, Prefixes and Suffixes.—Another important feature of Webster's Practical is its peculiar treatment of prefixes and suffixes, which is believed to be more desirable than a separate department of two or three hundred pages which is sometimes allotted to them.

7th, Compendium Matter.—Still another invaluable feature of Webster's Practical is its compendium matter, over one hundred pages of which is devoted to the most complete Pronouncing Vocabulary ever compiled of Biblical, Classical, Mythological, Historical and Geographical Proper names. With Webster's Practical Dictionary at hand, one need not be at a loss to correctly pronounce or spell the most difficult words.

8th, An Invaluable Book.—The importance of supplying every child with Webster's Practical for his very own, is not generally appreciated. As an educator it is worth a hundred times its price, and a little self-denial to provide one or more copies in every family will prove a better economy than an endowment of hoarded bank-stocks later on in life.

The following paragraph is reproduced from Webster's Practical.

Book, bŏŏk, n. A collection of sheets of paper, etc., bound together; a literary composition, written or printed; a subdivision of a literary work. (Mer.) A volume in which accounts are kept. — v. t. [BOOKED (bŏŏkt), BOOKING.] To enter, or register in a book. — Book'ish, a. Given to reading; more acquainted with books than with men. — Book'-bind'er, n. One who binds books. — -bind'ery, n. A place for binding, etc. — -bind'ing, n. Art or practice of, etc. — -case, n. A case with shelves for holding books. (Bind.) A book-cover. — -cov'er, n. (Bind.) A case for a book; a cover of cloth or other material prepared for casing a book. — -keep'er, n. One who keeps accounts. — -keep'ing, n. Art of recording mercantile transactions and keeping accounts. — -learned, -lĕr'nĕd, a. Versed in books; ignorant of life. — -learn'ing, n. Learning acquired by reading,—esp. as opp. to practical knowledge. — -mak'er, n. One who writes and publishes books: a compiler: a sporting man who makes a record of bets. — -mak'ing, n. The practice of, etc.: compilation; systematized betting. — -mark, n. Something placed in a book by which to find a particular place. — -plate, n. A label indicating ownership, place in a library, etc., usually on the inside of the cover of a book. — -post, n. The post-office arrangement by which books are mailed. — -sell'er, n. One who sells books. — -shelf, n. A shelf to hold books. — -shop, -stall, -store, n. A place for selling books. — -stand, n. A stand for selling books in the streets; book-stall: a support to hold books. — -worm, n. A worm or mite that eats holes in books; one excessively addicted to study.

THE QUANTITY TEST.

(The following exhibits are from the texts of the dictionaries named).

Webster's Practical Dictionary, ($1) 600,000 Words and 1,400 Illustrations.
New American Dictionary, ($1) 240,000, Words and 116 Illustrations.
National Popular Dictionary, ($1) 240,000, Words and 116 Illustrations.
National Standard Dictionary, ($1) 210,000 Words and 612 Illustrations.

Quality Test.—Aside from all advantages above alluded to, there is still another and very important feature of the new work to be considered, viz.: its quality as compared with the cheap dictionaries which have had the largest sales, and which have been compiled chiefly from the old editions of Webster on which the copyrights have expired. Hence Webster's Practical contains more matter than any other dollar dictionary. Its quality, to say the least, is the very best, while its arrangement and all other new and desirable features, including first-class illustrations, paper, printing and binding are added without extra charge.

A Subscription Book.—As Webster's Practical is not for sale at book-stores, our readers will be able to procure it only from canvassing agents, unless it be ordered in connection with this journal in accordance with our special offers.

The first shot penetrated the shoulder blade, the woman firing four others while Rossa was prostrate, all proving ineffective. Rossa's condition is not considered critical, and the woman bears her arrest calmly.

The trial of the Chicago election fraud conspirators began in the United States Court Thursday. On Tuesday night the County Clerk, Ryan, was served with a subpœna of the Legislature and directed by Speaker Haines to take the disputed ballots to Springfield at once. The Federal authorities learned of the scheme, and an order from Judge Blodgett directed Ryan to bring the ballots at once to the court. He failed to act promptly and a writ of attachment for contempt was issued.

Richard Short who stabbed Capt. Phelan in O'Donovan Rossa's office in New York, was held in $3,000 bail, Phelan who was in court looking wan and thin, identifying his assailant and asking for police protection. Two officers accompanied the Captain and his wife to their lodgings.

FOREIGN.

Advices from Egypt show that the British forces are in a deplorable and gloomy condition, and in great danger of another attack in force by the Mahdi. His troops have surrounded the British camp at Metemneh, and natives report that he has 30,000 men scattered between this point, Berber, and Shendy. Stewart's army at Gubat has been placed on three-quarter rations, and is preparing for an attack by the enemy. A Wonderful Book.

Laura S. Haviland is a quiet, gentle, unassuming Quaker woman, 76 years of age, yet vigorous, who has had a remarkable career of usefulness, and has now given to the world a remarkable history of her "Life Work" as a teacher, at an early day, of the colored refugees in Canada and in Michigan, and in other States, as a traveler down South in the guise of a "berry picker," helping out into freedom many slaves; as a nurse and preacher to the sufferers in hospitals during the war; and with Gov. St. John and Flizabeth Comstock, relieving the destitute and suffering refugees in Kansas, etc.

Her book is neither fiction nor founded on fiction, but is an interesting narration of facts of a most thrilling character, as every one will find and testify who will get and read her book, now on sale at the Cynosure office, 221 W. Madison St., Chicago, Ill. Price, cloth, $1,75; half Russia, $2.25.

THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT PROTEST.

Monday afternoon the last roll of signatures to the protest against the Masonic ceremonies at Washington next Saturday, was forwarded to the committee: Senator Pomeroy, Hon. Frederick Douglass and E. D. Bailey of the American. The list of mames received at this office numbered 10,869. From three points we are informed that 355 names were sent direct to Washington, from Oberlin, O., Monmouth, Ill., aud Sabetha, Kans., making in all at that time, 11,222.

We congratulate the Cynosure workers at this GRAND RESULT. If we shall have the help of God in following it up, there will be accomplished a greater work than any of our National Conventions. Many have worked in cold and snow; many dropped all other business for a day, because the matter demanded haste. The brief points from the letters that come in will be the liveliest reading in this number. They show how that if time and storm had not prevented 25,000 names could have been sent in easily—perhaps twice that number.

The next step will be to follow up the advantage these thousands of remonstrances give, and secure such action from Congress as shall preveut hereafter any Masonic performances over National buildings and monuments. Let us bend every energy to secure this most reasonable object.

During the progress of the Swaim court martial in Washington lately, a sensation was caused by an objection to one of the witnesses because he had no religious belief. He seemed to be a genuine agnostic, neither believing nor disbelieving in a Supreme Being. But we do not read that the court made at any time objection to a Freemason's testimony although the relations of Swaim to the order made it probable that no lodge member would testify against him, perjury or no perjury.

There has been much comment of late by papers outside of Chicago upon the dangers to be apprehended from the Socialist faction. The matter started from a measure, partially precautionary, taken by the commandant of one of the regiments of State militia, to set a guard over his armory. Somebody imagined this was to prevent siezure by the Socialists. A few hundred of these people, nearly all foreigners, have met every Lord's day for years, sometimes in the streets or parks, sometimes in halls. Some four years ago they attempted to parade under arms, like their kid-glove mates, the Knight Templars; but in this they were frustrated by the authorities, and a State law passed forbidding it. They have since been far less bold except with their mouths. Their inflammatory speeches, repeated week after week, have little effect upon people in general, and their converts are few, since their arguments are appeals merely to passion and fanaticism. They are evidently out of place in this country, and in ordinary times their following would be small.

The Austrian government has been constrained, to consider severe measures for the suppression of these Socialists, more stringent than those of Germany, where they are represented in the parliament. The Austrian bill provides for the superyision of charitable societies, allows any public meeting to be forbidden, confisticates pamphlets and tries without jury. An act against explosives in the Austrian Reichsrath allows punishment by death where the culprits could foresee the fatal effects of their deeds, and imprisonment for from five years to life for various offenses, such as selling or using explosives without authority. In the despotic countries where Socialism, is in a degree, a blind protest against the restriction of civil liberty, repressive measures are like damming a stream which might be made useful in promoting national glory and enlargement.

It is one of the last resorts of those who subsist by great public evils to cry out that business is being ruined and property depreciated. A Mormon elder in Chicago last week complained bitterly that the prosecutions, which are being pushed under the Edmund's law, are prostrating business, driving out Mormons, and even the Gentiles fear they must leave or starve because of this stagnation. This would be very dismal if it were not all a pitful lie. The Mormons do just as little business outside their sect as possible, and as for the Gentiles leaving because the "Saints" start off—why it needs but to be known that Utah is being cleared of the Mormon pest to fill it with enterprising American settlers. But this is the same story forever moaned in our ears whenever prohibition drys up the saloons. One would think a community would starve out if they did not keep a saloon-keeper fat. The lodge will begin to growl in the same toue when they begin to see their pagan temples crumbling under the assaults of the truth.

A gentleman from New Orlcans says that the lotteries of that city are almost as great an evil as the saloons further north. All classes patronize them and the freedmen, especially, are impoverished by this polite thievery. An Inter Ocean correspondent speaks of the numerous saloons and gambling houses in New Orleans. He visited several of the latter and in two of them found as many as 2,500 patrons playing games of different kinds for small stakes. The players were of the very lowest classes of whites and blaeks, "without education, and of the lowest grade of civilized life." Other gambling dens are guarded, not from the police, but from the lower caste and other questionable characters. It will be well if the agitation which must come through the Exposition infuses a more healthy circulation in the social life of New Orleans.

Manatee county in southeru Florida is greatly exeited at the discovery of a secret organization whose objeet is assassination. The post-master and United States land commissioner was shot in open day. His assassins were recognized and on arrest confessed that this murder-lodge consisted of some twenty members who have for some time been banded together for mutual protection and the removal of obnoxious persons, political opponents especially. They are bound to each other by terrible oaths to perform their bloody work and keep each others secrets. The information received shows this asssassination society to be one of the most atrocious organizations ever heard of. A Dr. Andrew was the ringleader. Many rich and influential men of Florida are said to belong to it. The murder of one Riley, several months ago, and of Charles Willard, recently, were said to have been the work of the assassins. In several instances citizens of Manatee county were waylaid and shot and their throats cut. The Rev. Mr. Lowe, of Sarasota, was whipped by the assassination society because of a misunderstanding with his step-son. Many reports of the bloody work of the society are in circulation and will be sifted. If the investigation does not show this band to have its origin in the Masonic lodge we miss our guess. That such an end may result from a Masonic organization is far from improbable, as we well know from the history of the Ku-klux and the Mollie Maguires.

THE MOTTO OF GOOD TEMPLARISM.

BY REV. J. D GEHRING.

The object of these letters being to show that the order of Good Templars is an off-shoot of Masonry and under Masonic control, I proceed to give some more evidence from my own experience. No one will deny that such evidence is worth more than the most emphatic assertion, denial or speculation.

It will be noticed that I am supporting my claim with evidence as I go along, that the institution, from the Grand Lodge down, is based upon despotism, favoritism and selfish ambition. Any institution, claiming to be moral and reformatory, which is not governed and conducted according to true, unyielding principle, is a moral abortion—a fraud. That the order of Good Templars is, as we know it to-day, conducted in a manner which leaves principle out of reach and out of sight, stands proved to the satisfaction of any candid mind. To illustrate this fact still further I shall relate one more circumstance which came under my observation about one year after the lodge had cast me out.

"Kewaskum Lodge I. O. G. T.," distant from Barton, Wisconsin, about seven miles, had among its most honored members two young men and their sister, children of a widow lady. I do not know whether or not the mother belonged to the lodge. At a sale of their personal property, preparatory to moving to Dakota, I was surprised and shocked to find one of the boys passing the whiskey around. My disgust was inexpressible when I found out, later, that beer by the keg was also on hand, and was promiscuously passed around in wooden buckets, so that men and boys could take and drink all they craved. The whisky was offered to all who wished to drink and seemed to be on hand in abundance. The beer failed sometime during the afternoon and a special messenger was speedily sent to Kewaskum for a full keg. One of the patrons of the sale became so completely intoxicated that they had to take him home in a wagon, lying upon some straw, like any other hog. I do not now remember how many drunken men I saw there that day, but it is fairly within the limits of truth to say that many of the bibulous fraternity knew not what they bought or what they bid.

Now, what did these Good Templars commit such an abomination for? For gain! They knew that the majority of the men attending their sale were habitual beer and whisky drinkers and would feel more free to bid if their appetite was duly honored. I presume they talked the matter over in family council before the day of the sale, and carefully compared cost and gaiu, and found that it would pay to furnish the drink. Lodge principles they had none to consult or consider, and for temperance principles they had uo regard; but the worst of all was, that they utterly disregarded their duty as professed followers of Him who commanded us to love our neighbor as ourselves, and warned us against the sin of covetousness.

But then, they claimed, as I was afterward told, that they did not violate their "cold water pledge" by furnishing drink to others as a matter of "hospitality" (!) for they didn't take pay for it (?) and drank none themselves. That shows, again, how Good Templars may, and do, construe and *mis*construe the very text of the pledge, or "obligation." If the reader will refer back to a former letter it will be seen that, where I quoted the Good Templar "obligation," I used the words, "use, furnish, or cause to be furnished to others," &c. That clause seems to leave no room for doubt that to furnish to others is a violation of the pledge, no matter what the motive or intention may be.

I was not a Good Templar at the time of this beer and whisky auction, and hence, could not enter complaint before the Kewaskum lodge against these beer peddlers. But there were several Good Templars, from the Barton and Kewaskum lodges on the ground, who could not help but see what I saw. To my certain knowledge, however, no complaint was ever entertained by any of them. Not only that, but the Kewaskum lodge honored these departing members with a "farewell supper" and a "farewell address," shortly before they went to Dakota! Thus, it may be said, the lodge became responsible for their act, and endorsed their conduct, as truly and emphatically as could have been done by a resolution to that effect. Kewaskum lodge could not, by any act or combined effort on their part as temperance workers," wipe out or counter-influence the effect of such conduct as that above mentioned. More harm was done by that one day's doing than could ever be offset by any "lodge work" that Kewaskum lodge might accomplish in a thousand years.

The above circumstance is, to my mind, the most conclusive proof that Good Templars' lodges, as such, care no more for true temperance principles than they care for the spiritual and eternal welfare of the individual member. But they do care "a heap" for "fees" and "dues."

"Faith, Hope and Charity!" Is it not despicable meaness for the "I. O. G. T." to pretend to be entitled to display this sacred trio? They call it their "motto." That they do not practice what the words teach is evident. Do they know what they mean? Let us see.

The Apostle Paul uses these three words with great emphasis. In his mind they were the grand summing up of all that is great and good and true in Christian faith and practice. But in the concluding verse of this wonderful chapter he leaves no room for doubt that he regarded "charity" or love, as the very crown of all the Christian graces.

In another place it is written, "love is the fulfilling of the law;" but the same is never said of faith and hope. In its proper application faith is the foundation of the Christian life, and of good works. But, faith and hope respect ourselves alone, whilst love takes in both God and man. Faith helps and hope sustains us; but love, to God and man, makes us gentle, obedient and useful.

Love, in the Bible sense, is a most sacred word. (I prefer to use the word "love" for "charity," because it conveys the correct meaning, and because "charity" is being so extensively used by "orders" and cliques as a coat to hide the wolf.) Now the phrase, "charity begins at home," is familiar to all. If the words were correctly, or appropriately applied, they would be proper enough; but those who use the phrase as a motto do not mean that charity must be a principle, a heart-quality, before it can be carried beyond the individual by his own act and word, but they involuntarity—unconsciously, perhaps—show by act and word that the phrase to them means no more than "charity ends where it begins."

The same sentiment is often expressed thus: "look out for No. 1." Now, No. 1 is "I." In latin it is "Ego"; hence the familiar English word "Egoism," which Webster says means "passionate love of self." It is easy to see, therefore, that the charity which begins at home is not charity in the true sense, but, on the other hand, pure, undisguised selfishness; because that kind of charity always stays at home. We cannot, properly, think of "charity" as a thing, a something which is possessed, but we must regard it as active, an eminently vital principle. It is an acknowledged moral force in the world. The Greek word, from which our word charity is borrowed, signifies "grace, or favor or joy." Thus: a benefit bestowed is a favor which inspires him who receives it with joy, and, so far, contributes to his happiness. In this sense "love" properly expresses that affectionate attachment one feels to a person whose distress we have been enabled to relieve. Love, therefore, apart from self-sacrifice, is not love in the true Bible sense, because it costs us nothing. It is easy to exercise charity, or love, toward those whom we highly esteem; to do good unto those who are willing and able to reward us again; to help those who are able to help themselves; and to speak meekly and sweetly to those who are gentle and tractable; but all that is of no value to those upon whom bestowed because it costs us nothing. The "love" which the Apostle Paul had in mind, when he wrote his letter to the Corinthian church, is an expensive article. It calls for a large, warm heart, liberal views and tenacious perseverance in well doing, regardless of loss or gain. The love which never goes beyond the family, the church, or the society, is so narrow that it hardly deserves to be called prudent selfishness. The charity which is taught, and so boastingly paraded before the world, by Masonry, Odd-fellowship and Good Templarism, is so far from being the charity of the Bible that we are surprised at the audacious folly of any sensible person claiming relationship between them.

A FOE TO CHRISTIANS.

A TERRIBLE AND POWERFUL MOHAMMEDAN SECRET SOCIETY WHICH COMMANDS THIRTY MILLIONS OF BELIEVERS IN THE PROPHET.

The following extracts from a letter of the London Standard's special correspondent in the Soudan will give an idea of the strength of the Mohammedan power with which Great Britain is now coping. The correspondent writes about this terrible organization as follows:

"Thou shalt be in the hands of Sidi Mohammed as a dead body in the hands of a corpse washer." Such is the form of initiation into the great Senoussi secret society, which in point of numbers, power and influence, far surpasses the Society of Jesus, even in the palmiest days of that confraternity. In 1868 Mohammed Ahmed, the Soudan mahdi, was initiated an a khonan, or brother preacher of the Sid Ab-el-Kader-el-Djilani fraternity, which forms one of the principal and most direct affiliations of the Senoussi society. It is, in fact, at the instigation of the grand master of the Senoussi that Mohammed Ahmed commenced his revolt with the Bagarra tribe in 1881.

The grand master of the Senoussi boasts that he has, more or less, at his command about 30,000,000 of Mohammedans—that is, over a third of the total number of the faithful. The greater portion of these being more or less subject to Christian powers, dream of nothing but of the universal empire promised by the koran. The feeling of intense hatred against the Christian is deeply engrafted in their hearts, and, whether latent or irruptive, the work which goes on is permanent. They are at any moment prepared to seize the opportunity of a struggle with civilized nations—their sole aim is a holy war, with neither truce nor mercy, against the unbelievers and against all those who covenant with the infidel.

The headquarters of the society are at Serhboub, latitude 30, longitude 24 1-3, on the shores of Lake Faregda, on the Egypto-Tripolitan frontier. Serhboub, founded in 1861 by Sheik Senoussi, resembles an immense fortified convent. Even ten years ago it had sixteen big guns, purchased at Alexandria, and several large factories, where gunpowder was produced, and small arms, obtained in Egypt, remounted and repaired. In February last the number of big guns had increased to over a hundred, and there were, besides, twenty mitrailleuses of German manufacture. According to trustworthy information two Italian and three Austrian vessels anchored during the months of June and July last in the port of Tabrouk—which belongs to the order—laden with arms, shot and shell, which were immediately forwarded over the 200 kilometers separating the port from Serhboub. There are also at the latter place a splendid library, transported thither from Mecca, the former headquarters of the fraternity, stables containing over four thousand horses, magnificent reservoirs and plantations, etc. According to the distinguished French author Duveyrier, the body-guard of the master who resides there consists of over three thousand Algerians. Fortified convents and stations, but on a less extensive scale, exist near Siwah, on the oasis of Jupiter Ammon, at the important oasis of Farafra, and at about twenty other places in Egypt, mostly in the various oases of the Lybian desert, while five or six hundred of these centers of action are known to be in existense in Turkey, Tripoli, Tunis, Algeria, Morocco, the Hedjaz, India, Yemen, Afghanistan, the Somali coast, and in fact wherever the Mohammedan religion has taken root, in Central Africa especially, at such places as Timbuctoo, and in the kingdom of the Wadai.

The agents of the order at Alexandria are well known; moreover, it has its representatives at Constantinople and in France. To give one solitary instance of the activity of these agents, I may state that during the commune one of the Senoussi stationed at Paris managed to purloin from the ministry of foreign affairs, in the Quai d'Orsay, a document of a compromising nature, stamped with the seal of the chiefs of the Touareg of R'dames tribe, who rank among the most fervent adherents of the order. Only the other day the well-known Arab newspaper, the Nusret, published a letter from a native doctor, in which the latter relates that the mahdi asked him "Whether it was true that Sultan William, of Prussia, had sent his grand vizier, Bismarck, to London to tell the English ministers that Germany, Austria, and Russia would not tolerate an English occupation of Egypt," and that he had afterward shown him letters from agents in Cairo, Alexandria, and Europe. The administration of the affairs of the order is confided to four "wuzeers" or ministers, residing at Serhboub, and acting under the immediate direction of the grand master, who is supreme. The members of the order, whose names are carefully registered, owe absolute and unquestioning obedience to the mokkadem, i. e., the rector of the community or of the convent of the district. The mokkadem, is, in his turn, subject to the agha, or dean, whose immediate superior is the vakil, or apostolic prefect of the province. Every member of the order becomes, ipso facto, a kind of missionary, who only awaits a sign from his chief to become a preacher, a soldier, a brigand, or even an assassin. For, just as in the case of the Jesuits, so it is with the Senoussi—le but justifie les moyens, and they have recourse even to the most outrageous means to attain the object they keep in view. The grand master, who styles himself, among other things, the "Khalifa," or lieutenant of God, corresponds with his subordinates by means of relays of special messengers, who in very confidential cases convey verbal messages only. To such a perfection are the means of communication carried among the Arabs that the Bedouins of the pyramids of Giseh announced the massacre of Col. Stewart's party at Mcrawi twenty-four hours before the official news of it reached Cairo. In the same way the bombardment of Berber, the surrender of Tokar, and the massacre at Sinkat were known here in the bazars long before the official news of it were received. The order was founded only forty-six years ago, by an Algerian of the tribe of Medjaher, named Mohammed Ben Alies-Senoussi. At an early age he adopted the philosophical tenets of the Chadhelistic school, which has much of the Wahbi doctrines about it. On the death at Mecca of Sheik Ahmed Ben Edris, who was the chief of the school in question, Senoussi, who had been his favorite disciple, was appointed to succeed him, and soon evolved, partly out of the koran and partly from his meditations, a purified kind of Chadhelism, which he caused to be adopted by the members of the sect as being the true and reformed Islamism, cleansed from all the superstitions and unorthodox practices which twelve centuries of theologians had grafted on to it.

The doctrine of this most intolerant of all reformed creeds is pretty much as follows: In the first place, the glorification of God, who alone is to be worshiped. Living saints may be venerated, but this veneration must cease immediately they die, and no pilgrimages to their tombs nor invocations of their names in prayer are permitted. The prophet Mohammed is no exception to the rule, although admitted to have been the most perfect of human kind. Unquestioning obedience is strictly enjoined, and even the sultan and all other chiefs of Monammedan states must conform to the precepts of Islamism as interpreted by the order, at the risk of hostility against them being declared as justified. All embroideries, gold or silver ornaments, or jewelry are strictly forbidden in the case of men, but are permitted to women. Tobacco and coffee are likewise severely prohibited. Tea is allowed, but it must be sweetened with brown sugar and not with white, for the latter is defiled by the bones of animals, killed by unbelievers, which are used to refine it. Members of the order are forbidden to speak, salute, trade with, or serve either Jews or Christians, and according to the precepts contained in a sermon preached in March, 1861, by Hadj Ahmed Ben Bel-Kasen, Mokkadem, in the town of Rhat, any Jew or Christian who is no longer a rayah—that is to say, who is no longer subject to a Mohammedan government—becomes an adversary whom it is lawful, nay, whom it is necessary to rob and kill at all times and in all places. The members of the order who possess a capital of over £5 pay annually 2½ per cent. thereon into the treasury, which receives in addition vast donations of cattle, lands, slaves, and money. Both the Turkish, Egyptain, and Tunisian governments have been most liberaly in granting it subsidies, lands, and fiscal immunities.

Sidi Mohammed Ben Ali-es-Senoussi, who, during the last years of his life, used always to hide his face with a veil, lest the brilliancy of his aspect should dazzle his disciples, died a few years ago in the odor of sanctity. Before his death he solemnly proclaimed his son not only as his successor as chief of the order, but also as the messiah, or mahdi. According to koranic tradition, the true mahdi was to make his appearance in the 1300th year of the hegirah—i. e., A. D. 1883—at which date he was to have attained his majority. His father's name was to be Mohammed, his mother's Fatima. The present grand master of the Senoussi fulfils all these requirements, and is known throughout the mussulman world by the name of Sidi Mohammed el Mahdi. It may be urged that since Senoussi claims to be the true mahdi there can be no co-operation on his part with the Soudanese mahdi, Mohammed Ahmet. This is a mistake. The koran distinctly states that several mahdis will arise simultaneously with the chief one, but that they will all in the end submit to the latter. It is probably with a view of verifying this prophecy that the Senoussi has called forth false mahdis in the Yemen and Hedjaz, in Syria, as well as in the Soudan.

If native accounts—the only ones we have at our disposal—are to be relied upon, it would appear that Mohammet Ahmet no longer claims to be the mahdi, but rather the principal forerunner, the St. John the Baptist, of the latter. It must not be forgotten that Mohammed Ahmet belongs to the Sidi Ab-el-Kaar-el-Djilani fraternity, which, as stated above, is one of the most direct affiliations of the Senoussi, and hence entirely subject and obedient to the Senoussi-el-Mahdi. There is no doubt but that the greater part of the clergy here at Cairo, and especially at the El Azar university, which is the great center of orthodox Islamism, either belong to the Senoussi or to one of the numerous affiliations of the order, such as the Sidi Ali Asadheli (which is the principal school or Mohammedan philosophy), the Sidi Mohammed Ben Asia, the Sidi Abd-el Rahman Bou Koberin, the Sidi-el-Madani, the Derkawa, etc.

One thing at least is certain, that all who belong to the creed of Mohammed are more or less subject to the influence of Senoussi, who teaches that no engagement, no oath, however sacred, can be considered as binding when contracted with a Christian.

THE SERMON.

IDOLATRY.—PREACHED BY REV. A. J CHITTENDEN, TO THE COLLEGE CHURCH, WHEATON, FEBRUARY 1, 1885.

They feared the Lord, and served their own gods; * * * So do they unto this day. II Kings, 27: 33, 41.

All eminent statesmen have been large readers of history. The best of them have been religious readers of history, and have received the one Book as the key to all the rest.

In this history, men are heard to speak and seen to act just as naturally as in any other time of the world; but in summing up the events of any section of a nation's life and closing with the record of some calamity, the writer says, God did this, and God did that, because of this and because of that transgression.

The capital sin of the Jew was, in his time, the chief sin of all the world, idolatry. The commandment against it was simple, rudimentary and suited to the times. It made the mere act of forming an image or likeness of anything for an object of worship the first crime in the category. It made the acknowledgement of any other name than Jehovah and Elohim to be state treason, and its penalty the heaviest known in their law.

This was because the sovereignty of God in the minds of the people could not be maintained in any other way. For, if any other god could receive honor, then the commandment of any other god imaginary could receive obedience; and imaginary gods are simply men's desires or dark fears deified. The course of individual and national destruction becomes then a swift and short one, because idolatry is simply men's desires run loose. The point of departure is, therefore, guarded by fearful warnings; and the record of punishments, expressly declared to have been of God, is in nothing so explicit as in their reference to the sin of idolatry. They seem to us terrible, and to some, needlessly severe; but that is because the sin of rebellion, as then defined, has not been considered.

Four hundred of the prophets of Baal were slain at the brook Kishon at the command of the preacher and prophet Elijah. Jehu slew all the rest of them in the temple of Baal itself with the servants and priests. But this was long ago, you say. Is there anything to-day that corresponds to the national and family sin of the people who lived 900 years before Christ?

Forms and circumstances change. The fires of Moloch are not burning; Baal and Ashtaroth are not named, as such, in any modern service; people are not dancing round a calf of gold; and the shrine of Diana has no appointment on our Sabbath, or in our sanctuary. There is no temple to Buddha, Josh, or Jupiter, and none for the nine-and-twenty gods of Egypt.

But wherever sin abounds idolatry abounds. It has been banished from the world of sense and ceremony, in part, but the world of the soul, and the soul of society, are given to all the spiritual forms of sin that existed twenty-five hundred years ago, wherever the world's inner life is not subject to the law of God in Jesus Christ.

This is an age of intensified goodness or badness; of badness very black and of goodness very white. Virtue and vice exist each in the most concentrated forms. We have in morals and religion what the apothecary has in drugs, the extracts and essences, in place of the grosser forms direct from nature's fields and groves.

We have the extracts of idolatry existing along with the most refined and highly cultivated worship of the true God. Wherever we have the spirit of Christ in all the simplicity of its modern life, released from servile ceremonies and sense-appealing rituals, we have also the fact of

ESSENTIAL IDOLATRY.

And this modern idolatry is all the more dangerous because it has no service and no ritual of its own. If it were carved or sculptural it would repel by the very grossness of its demand. Its aggressive power is great because it works as a spirit without body or name. It does not disclaim God, and it does not repudiate Jesus the Christ. But it refuses to submit the heart to the will of God in his law or Gospel.

These are the idolaters who "fear the Lord and worship their own gods, even unto this day." They are not separated by social or national boundaries, but enter all best society with privileges unlimited, and have almost as close access to the worshipers of Jesus as evil spirits have to the souls of his followers.

I am not in this discourse, dealing with those bald-headed remnants of heathenism which appear yet in the Catholic churches and the semi-Catholic, or High Church.

I had not intended to even illustrate this discourse by the puerile hodge-podge compound of inartistic mummeries displayed in open lodge worships. The reader who has had the patience to go over the report of a late Lodge of Sorrow held by Knight Templars in the city of New York will be inclined to doubt whether open idolatry is quite extinct among us. I have no doubt at all that Masonry, if allowed free run, would re-establish a system of composite idolatry, rank and riotous, with high-priest and pope and power tyrannical beyond the reach of any ancient archon, Baalite or Druid system. I am disposed to apologize to the Romish church for associating their name with such a systematized negation of any god in particular and such a practical rejection of the Saviour of the world.

"A mass for the repose of the dead who had passed beyond the thirteenth degree of Masonry!" They were disposed of in batches of seven each. They had the golden candlestick from Jerusalem and from the book of Revelation. They had incense altars from the land of the Parsees, and priests from the temples of the Nile. The reporter says that anybody who did not understand the service might suppose they were meant to represent Isis and Osiris. Just as if they were not so meant. And they had neophytes in train and images of angels that melted in the sacred flames, and aphorisms for the deluded dead, and a crypt and little temple after the fashion of the worship in old Karnak and Edfoo in the land of bondage. There is no reason why their cards of invitation should not include the worshipers of Josh, or their committee of programme the priests of that very ancient and childlike people. A few sublime pigtails would complete the cosmopolitan appearance of the scenery and render the "religion of all religions" consistent before the public.

In some sense these modern mystery saints seem to fear the Lord. They talk of damnation to be inflicted by some god by and by; and they worship their own gods here by common consent.

But let us return to the consideration of respectable idolatry—that has neither temple nor lodge.

The first essential of true religion is that which gives God's will first place in the government of men. To us his will has been twice revealed, and the best of natural conscience is confirmed by the Bible, its sense of guilt releived and the way of life made plain through Jesus the Christ. To worship our God is to accept his commandments by Moses and Christ, and appeal to them for the warrant of all our conduct. To worship God is to try to please him. To worship God is to fear to offend him. To worship God is to hold all we possess ready for his service, and to worship the Saviour of men is to love the salvation of men more than any earthly possession or pleasure. To worship Christ is to bear the cross and accept the humiliation that is incidental to such a life, and it is to acknowledge no other ground of hope for eternal life, and to do religious reverence to no other name, notion, rite or custom. It includes trust in God and Christ for a present providence; for the continuation of any natural blessing and the gift of special care and comfort.

Idolatry, now, means anything opposed to these things. Not to love God is to be an idolater. For not to love God is to give your love to something other than God. You may then retain some fear of the Lord and serve your own chosen ends of life: pleasure, gain, honor, passion, vanity, learning, or the simple idea of having your own will in your own way. This is essential idolatry—idolotry stripped of its husks, or embodiments, and distilled in modern life.

Not to trust in God for daily blessings is idolatry. All the relics of heathenism show us the people in the act of acknowledging the fostering care of their supposed gods. If our religion does not take in the idea of divine providence, it is not up to the religion of the average heathen. Serving pleasure and fearing the consequences without any gratitude to God is a form of idolatry that has its parallel in the grosser abominations of the barbarous world, where they acknowledge some god only to fear him.

The ways in which men fear the Lord and serve their own gods to-day are these:

1. They acknowledge the true God and give practical honor to other powers, real or supposed.

Men believe that if they possess certain things they are secure. They believe in God somewhat, they fear him somehow, and look to other sources of security. Their lives are, therefore, worldly in spirit and practice. They keep to their religion in form and serve the god of the world all the time. They show this in the reverence which they manifest in the society of the wealthy for the mere possession of wealth. That unmistakable submission of the man to circumstances is idolatry, radical and dominant. We give the rich man first place to-day as in other days—and we do not very much enquire into the methods by which he has power over men and things. We bow to his circumstantial worth and do his possessions reverence. This began to be the case in the church as early as the time of James. Just when the older and grosser forms of idolatry were passing into decline this modern form gained a place. But not without the warning of the apostle.

"They oppress you, they drag you before the judgment seat." "If ye have respect of persons ye are become judges of evil thoughts."

Men of the church profess honor to God, and love to Christ, but show in practice more trust in forms and methods, inventions and appliances than they do in God and his care. We thought that a republican form of government would secure us against all the ills of society: and we have worshiped it annually for more than a century. To-day we are making the discovery that men may be just as wicked and mischievous here as in England. That the tyranny of a corrupted ballot-box is dangerous as well as any other tyranny. We have found that a republic can give power to bad people as well as a monarch, and that the people can be besotted and corrupted and enslaved to-day as well as at any ancient time. We have worshiped constitutions, and articles of State. We have worshiped parties till there was no longer any enquiry for principles. Party-olatry is a fitting word that has been invented to desiguate it. It has made dupes of religious people, scoundrels of base people and slaves of the ignorant and confiding. It is easier to-day to remove idolatry from the interior of Africa than to break the spell of party-olatry in the United States.

2. We idolize forms in the church. We make too much of the modes of fellowship and not enough of the spirit.

Congregationalism has not proved itself adequate to the protection of the churches. We thought it would. It opened the way of escape from other tyrannizing types of government, and then began to dominate like the old masters. An ecclesiastical ring of mutual admirers, claiming to grant recognitions and dispense the livings of the church is not always better than the dispensation of a pope or cardinal or bishop. When ecclesiasticism receives worship as much as the Holy Spirit, it is not far removed from the time when both will be reviled by those who wish evil to the churches. When clerical domination gets overgrown God will commission his ministers again in his own simple way and send them out across lots to rebuke the usurper in the church, by giving them the hearts of the people as he did in the year of our Lord 33.

3. We fear the Lord and worship our own gods when we use a human name to denominate a church of Christ. It is a shameful form of idolatry to call ourselves as Christians after the name of Swedenborg, or Luther, or Calvin or Wesley. They did not die for us upon the cross. They would not allow such things if they were here again. They did not ask such things when they were here. What has seduced the church into such paganism—making divinities of some man prominent in a particular branch of theology?

4. Perhaps the trouble lies further back, and in the fact that men have made over-much of doctrinal statements and too little of Christ. Creed worship is idolatry, when we emphasize our form to the disparagement of essentials in fellowship. When we refuse to honest people admission to church fellowship till they can undergo a scholastic examination, we shut the gate of the kingdom of heaven, and it is doubtful on which side of it we stand ourselves. "If thou believest with all thine heart thou mayest," is the Gospel as Jesus left it. "If you can endorse the 'thirty-nine articles' in the sense that I take them, you may come in," is idolatry. It is usurpation in the place of worship which should be rendered to to the Saviour uttering his great, broad invitation to anxious, honest men. There is even less excuse for barring the gateway to the kingdom of heaven by our construction of a sacramental custom. * * * The difference between the better class of Samaritans and the true Jew was not greater than this divergence from the grand primitive spirit of the Christian religion.

5. Perverted instincts are certain to make idols of the objects on which they fix themselves. Numberless freaks of unregenerate hearts are to be classed under this phase of idolatry. The extravagant love of money that makes the insane miser, first made him an idolater. That love of land possession that leaves no satifaction in the last lot added is idolatry, and running to insanity in every case. Extravagant love of women is idolatry. That immoderate adoration rendered by the girl to her first choice, when she is absolutely certain that another such does not live in the wide world, will find some day, when the scales have fallen, that she was an idolater. Had she submitted the whole question of her doubtful course to the Saviour, whom she professed to serve, she would have been rescued from her insanity in time to be wisely won and wed to a man ten times superior to her abandoned idol. I have seen a woman elegantly attired, drawing along behind her what seemed to be an animated skein of yarn. But it was not a skein of yarn; it was a live dog, banged and frizzed. When she entered the coach, the dog was gently passed into her lap. At home the dog was placed on a kind of pedestal or ottoman, and was fed with the daintiest that the larder could afford. It wore a ribbon or a collar of precious metal, and had a name by which it was known and worshiped. Many a little barefooted, homeless wanderer on the street has envied that dog, and wished they had such a mother as it had. Is this idolatry? What is it? The holiest thing left among the ruins of the fall, the pride of God himself, a mother-love all expended on a little frisky specimen of domesticated wolf!

I would not say how many have their pet forms of idolatry, while they in some sense fear the true God. Will God pardon it? If he does he will cure it. I must not have anything before him. Not even my own child can have idolatrous love. It is not good for me; it is not good for the child. They love their children best who love them as the gift of God, to be returned with improvement and not to be spoiled by indulgence. She loves her household best who does not yield her sense of duty to any freak of fancy or world-worship. And he loves best his wife and children who does not surrender his appointed station to agree with any precocious and premature successor in authority or to any new-discovered rivalry of sex. Any other principle of action at home is disobedience to the supreme God and serving the god domestic.

It is not in groves and temples that we are to look for idolatry to-day; but in the common walks of life. The gods we worship will be seated, not on wooden thrones or thrones of ivory, but in our habits, motives, loves and ambitions. The character of the life will appear in the consequences, and old age is a tell-tale period. The disppointed look and step of the matured man is evidence of a false worship in the heart of the man. The penalties for serving our own gods are as various as the divinity we serve, but one thing is true of all idolaters; they become dark in mind and despairing in their prospects. All things perish with the using, and the hopes they cherish must perish with their divinity. A time must come when those who serve the creature more than the Creator will be in themselves the loudest confession of their life-long sin of self-devotion.

Monstrous pride will be left to gnaw itself as a false god. Self-worship is idolatry. Vanity that poses self before self in worshipful contemplation is false to God who made us and said, "Worship me." Ambition comes home from its tiresome expeditions with withered leaves instead of fruit. Place hunters in the sacred office receive spirit-dearth and sometimes death, for their fraudulent professions, and because they have served their own gods they are liable to have their portion with hypocrites and unbelievers. The idol worshipers of all the ages have perished. Self-love leaves darkness and devil-fear as its legitimate end. God enthroned in the affections and the will is light and life. Jesus deified his Father's will. In this he became King of kings and Lord of lords. We have an inheritance with him, regal and glorious, if we stand proof against the idolatry of our time, and say to him who offers "all these things," "Get thee behind me, Satan; for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve."

BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS:

OR

THE QUESTION OF THE HOUR.

BY E. E. FLAGG, AUTHOR OF "HOLDEN WITH CORDS."

CHAPTER X.—Concluded.

Two of the men laughed. The third one looked thoughtful. The fourth member of the party, which was Schumacher, shrugged his shoulders.

"We are not Grand Moguls. Liquor will be sold and drank for all us."

"So it will while we allow it. As a class we hold the sovereign power in our own hands, and if, instead of listening to political demagogues every election, each working man would make his ballot a straight shot at the rum power, I warrant that it wouldn't be a great while before our Senators and Representatives at Washington would get some new light on the subject. Better read over again the fable of Hercules and the wagoner. If we working men are ever to improve our condition the help must come from ourselves first. And it won't come by sitting still and railing against the rich. If they oppress us the worst is their own, but at the least they give us work and wages. What does the liquor power do for us? Cripples and paralyzes every single industry by which we earn our bread. Let us roll that burden from our shoulders and then labor will be prepared to resist the tyranny of capital to some purpose."

But talk like this was making Nelson unpopular, for though his fellow-workmen dimly realized that he stood on a higher mental plane than the most of them; had read more, thought more, and observed more—still there were many, as he told Martha, who construed his words into a tacit desertion of their cause, and turned the cold shoulder on him in consequence.

He went back to his boarding-place feeling as if it was a strange new kind of Sunday without the Sabbath peace and spirit of devotion. Tom was sitting in his old place coughing feebly, and watching with dull, vacant gaze a belated fly that was slowly and stiffly buzzing about in a streak of cold, white sunshine.

Outwardly Tom bore a much closer resemblance to his mother than either of the two others. As nature had given him at the start a much weaker physical frame than the stalwart Nelson, so she had cast his features in a proportionately finer mould; and the epileptic fits which had fastened on him in childhood, the result of that injury to the brain received from his father's drunken blow, however they might dim his intellect could not wholly mar the original beauty of the chiseling.

"Well, Tom, old fellow!" was Nelson's cheery greeting; "I'm going to stay with you all day. What do you say to that? It seems good to see the sun coming out. Let me wheel your chair into it."

Nelson had devoted himself heart and soul to his unfortunate brother without the least idea that he was doing anything very noble, or worthy of particular remark. There are natures that seem to be morally "born in the purple," and the most unlimited drafts on their generous self-devotion are honored at first sight with the confidence of one who has in his soul a whole royal exchequer to draw from.

So he had fought Tom's battles with a rude and scornful world, and no wonder that he seemed to the latter a perfect incarnation of wisdom and strength. Tom stood somewhat in fear of him, it is true, but it was that kind of fear which we are told in Scripture is not inconsistent with the highest love; and when his fit of coughing subsided, he showed Nelson with much delight a newspaper on which he gravely marked with his forefinger a length of about two columns and a half. To make believe read was one of Tom's amusements, and Nelson always humored him by taking the matter very seriously.

"All that this morning! You've done bravely, Tom, since I've been gone. I'm thinking you'll be lots of help to me when I get my farm."

Tom smiled contentedly. That farm was his Eldorado. His feeble mind made his anticipations of its freedom, plenty and varied delights like a child's, a pleasure from which all elements of care, worry, or possible disappointment were entirely eliminated. Though Nelson did not now feel in just the mood for such castle-building, he went over the story again for Tom's amusement, and when he could think of no further enlargements or additions that could be truthfully made to it, he began to sing in a melodious, baritone voice—

"On Jordan's stormy banks I stand
And cast a wishful eye,
To Canaan's fair and happy land,
Where my possessions lie."

In singing to Tom he generally chose old-fashioned hymns. They chimed in best with his strong, thoughtful, earnest, nature; and they reminded him, besides, of his mother. How she used to satisfy the hunger of her homesick heart with Watt's grand old lyrics!

When he reached the last line of the hymn Tom was asleep. Nelson got up, poked the fire a little, and then took the newspaper which Tom had dropped. He looked over the usual list of murders, wife-beatings, and brutal assaults in which, strangely enough, high-licensed whisky appears to be just as prolific as the more plebeian sort which lacks that peculiar stamp of respectability; and then he passed to the column headed, "Labor Troubles." Everywhere there seemed to be an epidemic of strikes. In the coal-fields Molly Maguirism was cropping out, and the whole industrial world appeared to be generally in a state of upheaval and disturbance.

Nelson took a pencil and figured up on the white margin something like a rough approximation to the sum lost by labor per week. Startling as were the figures, he knew he had under-rated the factors by which he had obtained this result.

And what of that vast sum lost every year by the liquor traffic? Nelson was enough of a political economist to understand with Adam Smith that the one great law on which all equitable trade is built is the law of corresponding values; in other words, that value taken must always mean value received in something of direct profit or service to the buyer. And when the liquor business ignores utterly this underlying law in political economy, this rule of reciprocal giving and taking, and decrees that all the profit and advantage shall be on one side only, can such mischievous violation of so fundamental a principle help reacting disastrously on trade? Is it not laying a hand on the very main-spring of every lawful industry? and must not the legitimate fruits be dull times, poverty, distress, and that remedy worse than the disease—strikes?

And what of the liquor power as a ruling force in government? Did not every election prove that its immense wealth was simply a bribery fund? To this corrupt and corrupting factor in politics with its hundreds of millions annually stolen from the people, could anything be said to be impossible in the way of chicanery and fraud? One wrong fostered, one injustice upheld made room for others to gather their foul brood under the same broad shield of national law; and legislative integrity thus sapped, on what could the poor man base any reasonable hope of being protected from the greed of unscrupulous money kings and soulless corporations?

Nelson wanted to confront the question fairly. He believed he had done so, when in reality he had seen but one side of this double-faced Janus.

CHAPTER XI.

WHICH TREATS OF MATTERS HISTORICAL AND PROPHETIC.

At this juncture we perceive a growing restlessness among some of our readers. Countless voices are raised in defence of their own pet insurance society, and learned college professors hope we shall not be so unwise and unjust as to include their beloved Greek letter fraternities in the same condemnation. And as many of these good people take pains to assure us that they are opposed to Masonry; that they have some adequate idea of its ability to corrupt the courts, paralyze the hand of justice, and shield every murderer, rumseller, or bank defaulter who puts his trust in its shadow, we will stop the thread of our story long enough to relate a certain episode in the career of Napoleon, which, though unfamiliar to the average student, was one of those hidden factors of Providence which bring about the mysterious and unlooked-for results that so often baffle human calculations.

At the very threshhold of his conquests, at the very moment when his hand was stretched out to grasp imperial power, he met, like the heroes of Greek story, a dragon to stay his farther progress. That dragon was Freemasonry. Masonic lodges covered alike Protestant Germany and Catholic Spain. Under their mask aristocrat and anarchist, free-thinker and Jesuit, could plot together in a horrible unity—the unity of the pit. Already it had overthrown the Puritan commonwealth in England, and lighted in Paris the lurid flames of the French Revolution.

Two courses lay open before him. He could grapple with the monster—crush, annihilate it if possible; or he could make it his tool, his slave, his faithful ally. The "Man of Destiny," whom neither Alps nor Russian snows could daunt, and at the tread of whose armed hosts all Europe was shaking in terror, quailed before the first alternative and chose the second. At his dictation his own trusted generals and marshals entered the various lodges, became their leaders, and controlled them completely in the interests of imperialism till St. Helena ended the drama.

It was not the first time that Masonry has been paid in her own coin, nor will it be the last that this spiritual sorceress in her trade of duping and fooling men has been made herself the dupe and fool of crowned and mitred heads. This shrewd stroke of Napoleonic policy was only a slight variation of her own favorite game, and one which she is now playing in our own free Columbia with mueh success.

Odd-fellowship and the hundreds of minor secret orders she officers with her own most tried and trusted generals, and has no desire—indeed would have the greatest objection to see the rank and file turn Masons. She well knows that they make far more tractable subjects as they are. Vowed to obey unquestioningly Masonic superiors, and those superiors sworn in turn to obey all above them in continual gradations till the apex is reaehed at the top of which sits the eommander-in-chief in the shape of a most Sublime and Illustrious Sovereign Grand Inspector General, we can easily see how with only the bridle of a minor temperance order the whole body can be turned about in any given—Masonic—direction.

REFORM NEWS.

The Niagara County Association, N. Y., will hold its annual meeting in Arcade Hall, Loekport, Feb. 25th and 26th. A full attendance is requested.

W. B. Stoddard, State Agent.

THE MASSACHUSETTS STATE MEETING.

Reading, Mass., Feb. 6., 1885.

Dear Cynosure:—Our much desired "Annual Meeting" has, at last, come and gone. Unlike such gatherings in other States, it was not attended by friends or foes with either the numbers, or the interest which had been anticipated.

No doubt this was owing partly to the inclemeney of the weather, but mainly to the fact that sufficient time could not be given for preparation, so that before the public or "the friends" could be suitably notified the time had come and the meeting was upon us. We were notified by letter from Bro. McFall, on Friday, Jan. 30, that the meeting would begin the next Tuesday, Feb. 3. As soon as it could be done, notices were printed, and as fast as possible eirculated. Notice was also given in all the churches but one on Sunday. Only four or five friends from abroad came—not even the president, or some others who had promised to be here. Not knowing why they came not, we would not judge them; but we can assure them that they missed a rare treat in those excellent speeches of Bros. McFall and Stoddard. It is certain, however, that the seed they sowed, fell into some "good ground;" so that, as it is God's way "to save, not by many, nor by few," "not by might, nor by power, but by his Spirit," we may not say that our meeting was in any sense in vain. This old historic town, once so famous as the centre from which that great "light on Masonry" was so widely reflected from the revelations of Morgan and Bernard, must and will, ere long, be once more enlightened.

The bitter cold of the weather without, and the heart-chilling emptiness within the house, fitly symbolized the nightful moral darkness and stupefaction which, like a horrible nightmare, now broods over this lodge-cursed region. No church, no department of the community, is exempt.

With the church under the great curse of the Andoverian "Advanced Theology," that revivified and reinvigorated relic of the old Roman, Eyptian and Babylonian paganism, and church, clergy and community blinded, spell-bound, by the "unclean," "lying wonders" of the same hydra-headed paganism, under its many specious, secret, oath-bound disguises, it is no wonder that this effort to call public attention thereto, has met with no better success. "The prophets have no vision" against lodgery. Speak of it to them, and if they do not stand up, boldly in its defence, they shrink and cower, with fear and dread, lest they may offend some member or advocate thereof, who perhaps has his heel in some way upon the neek of the church. Their prayer seems to be, "Help us to serve God, as not to offend the devil" O Lord, how long!

Why may we not hope that the N. C. A. will send into New England some of her "men of God," who like Paul and Bro. Stoddard, "are not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ?" C. A. S. Temple.

THE KANSAS WORK.

Dear Editor Cynosure:—Permit me to say, through our paper, that I have just returned from a very pleasant, and I trust a profitable visit, to Manhattan the county-seat of Riley county, Kan., where I spoke twice in the Court-house, Monday and Tuesday evenings, to not large (it being very sloppy) but very attentive audiences. The sheriff kindly made fires, and lit up the house free. It is pleasant to receive such kindness from those who are not enlisted in the reform work; but especially encouraging to meet sueh veterans in the cause of reform as Elder H. S. Limbocker, of the Freewill Baptists, who knows so well how to make you comfortable and encourage the heart of the laborer.

One thing I notice since I have started in this work, that the grey-haired veterans in the anti-secrecy cause, were vigorous anti-slavery soldiers, and are vigorous prohibitionists, and National Reformers, thus manifesting, that, when the heart is right, the man is ready to work for every interest of his fellow men—the family, the church, and the state. I must not omit the name of S. B. Kokanour, of the River Brethren, who also is editing a small religious monthly, and intending to advocate anti-secrecy.

But it is sorrowful to see the moral cowardice, or the insensibility,—not produced by wine, but by their unmanly submission to the despotism of the lodge,—among the watchmen on the walls of Zion. Out of six ministers, Father Limbocker prevailed on five to announce my appointment and but one attended, and only one night; yet two of them told him privately they had quit the lodge. What a fearful thing it will be to them, if the blood of the flock is required at their hands. The brethren at Manhattan are anxious to have a eonvention as soon as they are able to maintain one, and I trust that through their Christian efforts and example, and the seed sown, as we hope, in good ground, they will soon be able. They were very liberal in their support of the cause, for which they have my hearty thanks, and my prayer for the blessing of God on the cause in that plaee. Pray for me. R. Loggan.

P. S. Bro. Limbocker tells me there is a brother of one of the three Masons who were appointed by the Masons to fire Miller's house in Batavia 1826, living in Manhattan. R. L.

SHERIFF GARLINGHOUSE VINDICATED.

A GOOD LETTER FROM HIS SUCCESSOR.

283 Madison Ave., New York, Feb. 9, 1885.

Editor Christian Cynosure:

Dear Sir:—Your excellent paper, of the 5th inst, containing a cut of Canandaigua Jail has been forwarded from my home, at Canandaigua, to me here, where I am sojourning a month or two at the residence of one of my daughters and her husband.

I have cut out the printed "Remonstrance" addressed to the "Congressional Committee on Washington Monument," which I have signed and herewith enclose to you, as you request, to be forwarded to the committee.

Referring to the cut of the old jail, I would say that it is an excellent representation of it as it now is, and as it was at the date of the abduction of William Morgan; except, that at that time the trees in front, as now shown were not there. They were all planted by me in 1838, and have grown up since. I was elected to succeed Mr. Joseph Garlinghouse as sheriff of the county, in the fall of 1837, on an Anti-Masonic party ticket, the first year of its county and State organization.

In justice to Mr. Joseph Garlinghouse, and "the truth of history," I desire to say that I knew him intimately; and although he had long previous to the abduction of Mr. Morgan joined a Masonic lodge, he had abandoned the institution, and withdrawn from it, before that time. He was twice elected sheriff of the county, but never kept the jail himself. His residence was all the time some thirteen miles distant from Canandaigua, at Richmond. The jail was in charge of Israel R. Hall, his deputy, at the time of the abduction. It was said that Hall was a Mason, at the time, which was doubtless true. Respectfully and truly yours, Myron H. Clark.

HOW ONE PROTEST WENT ROUND,

Shiloh, Iowa.

Editor Cynosure:—I write to inform you what I did with the remonstrance. I received the circular on the evening of the 4th inst. On the 5th I helped a young man cut cord-wood till three o'clock P. M.; we then started to get as I thought ten or a dozen names to the remonstrance. We continued this work over the prairies arriving at my house a little after 6; got supper and took in a little more territory, arriving at home at 9:30, having obtained thirty names without hesitation when the object was clearly understood, except by one person. On the morning of the 6th, the young man accompanying me, we started across the country taking in the most thickly settled road to Clarence, picking up several names on the road. It began to snow soon after we started, that made it unpleasant; we pushed on to Clarence, put up the team, and went to work first to the doctor, who fixed up my torn protest in good shape by puting a strengthening plaster on its back and placing his own name on its face. I called on most of the business houses, but obtained the names of only two business men, but got the name of the editor, told him I would take his paper three months, and paid him for it. I left a copy of the petition at the post-office with a request to call attention to it and obtain signatures, which the young lady clerk cheerfully consented to do. I started for home by way of Stanwood; I arrived home about 6 P. M, having a total of 103 names.

Feb. 7th.—We struck out this morning over the country and had started but a little while when it began to snow lively with considerable wind; but we drove about eight miles in getting to Tipton, the county seat of Cedar county, having obtained 22 names without a refusal. Arriving at Tipton I sent the young man home with the team, and put in the time till a short time before the mail closed and in footing up my list in the office of one of the county papers, I found the number to be 176, which I requested the foreman to make a note of, together with the petition, which he agreed to do. But he refused to sign the petition as did the M. E. minister, and all of the officials of the court house that I saw. Not one Mason in Tipton would sign it; most of them pleasantly declining. Only seven men in Tipton who serve the public signed the petition; one a doctor, one blacksmith, three grocery men, one butcher, and a baker. John Dorcas.

WHO WROTE IT?

St. Paul, Minn.

"What a fool crank you are! You know many of these statements are lies. Who made you the interpreter of the will or the Almighty, or gave you the right to state when the Lord is angry or otherwise? If Masonry is what you claim it to be, the Lord will fix it in his own way and time without your help. Better put in your time in some useful occupation, else the Lord may call you to account for opportunities thrown away."

I received the above as an anonymous communication addressed to me through the mail accompanied with a tract entitled, "A Warning against Freemasonry." Will the writer of the communication dare to venture from his lurking place and publicly deny over his real name any statement in that tract that is stated as a principle of Freemasonry? He will know my "right," etc., at the Judgment day.

WILLIAM FENTON.

IDOLATRY TO-DAY.

I notice in a respected journal a remark by an old correspondent, formerly a preacher, that he is "waiting by the river till the Grand Master above calls me from labor to refreshment," who, therefore, asks "an interest in the prayers of the church."

We might ask if he also asks an interest in the prayers of the lodge. From our standpoint we heartily pity such aged inquirers, and believe that their Christian hope and faith, if not extinguished, are sadly clouded by the falsehoods of their lodgery. "No man can serve two masters." Christianity and Freemasonry are each seeking to be the universal bond of brotherhood. If the one reigns supreme, the other must be dethroned. There is the poison of idolatry mingled in the language quoted above, and one prayer of the church for him ought to be first of all that he should be brought to see and confess and forsake the sinful alliance in which he seems still to be deluded.

Many modern professing Christians are like Solomon who built the temple to the God of Israel and also altars to false gods. "They served the Lord and worshiped their graven images." Akin to that practice is our modern lodgery with its man invented rites and ceremonies which are subversive of the authority of our Bible and its Christ. It is specially melancholy to see aged men of otherwise Christian characters using language which shows they retain the delusion into which they had been snared in early years. False worships and false Christs abound now, as foretold by the Saviour and his apostles, and it is to-day a duty, as imperative as when the command was given by our Lord, to "watch" against the false teachers and false Christs which are of the same delusive, self-righteous character as the devil's language in Eden or the idolatries of the Israelites, or the similar idolatrous character of the secret brotherhoods of lodgery.

Why does not this journal warn its many thousands of readers against lodgery as it does against intemperance? We cannot think the editor one who would ask, "Am I my brother's keeper?" A SCOT.

RELIGIOUS DECAY.

LASALLE, Ill.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I notice in the issue of the 22d of January that you speak of Robert Ingersoll's remarks about the decline of Christianity, and Dr. Kittridge's answer giving four hundred and fifteen million Christians in our world.

David, when he numbered Israel, fell under God's displeasure. This may be the result with the church to-day, more particularly because few of them are saved. How many of them "strive to enter into the kingdom," think you? "agonizing in prayer?"

When Bro. Hinman was here I told him this was the first religious paper I had taken for eighteen years. I could not tolerate the insincerity of our professors of religion; the heathenism of our day is beyond that of the Jews when Jesus made his advent in Judea; and now "When I come," said Jesus, "will I find faith in the earth?"

How many of the Papists are illuminated by the Spirit? "No man can call Jesus the Christ except by the Holy Spirit." I make bold to say none of them. "Faith works by love and purifies the heart." How many "Masons" and "license"-voting professors of religion are holy? "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord." How many covetous professors are Christians? "Covetousness is idolatry." No idolator hath eternal life. There is a small remnant only to-day; the seven thousand God owns in the earth—the pure in heart, see God, now spiritually. Christian professor, God abides in the heart. "Ye are not of the world." If the cross has ceased Christ is of none effect. Christ said, "Woe unto you, hypocrites;" ye tithe mint and cummin," but justice and mercy are not regarded. "In the last days perilous times shall come; men shall be lovers of their own selves, having the form of godliness but denying the power thereof."

"If we judge ourselves we shall not be judged." Ingersoll judges us by the Gospel standard and stumbles over us down to perdition. "If the blind lead the blind both fall into the ditch." Now, how does this come? Is it not apparent that we are not in the Spirit, and that they who are in the flesh can not please God?

The Holy Spirit in man (God with us) the angel said would be grieved through the manifold temptations that prosperity would bring. This is the rejection of Christ. Paul knew Christ no longer after the flesh. The present worship of Jesus, our not "discerning the Lord's body," has landed us in the worship of the creature instead of the Creator—pretty good Unitarians, but not as good as the first proselytes to that religion, J. Q. Adams and his following; for they had more integrity of character than we see to-day, for they stood in their own good works although much conformed to the world and vanity. If you would see this in the Word you will notice that the angel holding the four winds, as in Ezekiel's vision, is the withdrawal of the Spirit in the Apocalypse. This act brings loss or hurt, but a work that is of grace comes, sealing the children of Israel in their foreheads, denoting that intellectual apprehension saves to a small extent the people of God.

Our Christianity of to-day does not save to but a small extent in this life, because it is of the head instead of the heart. There is little love and very little purity or holiness; therefore Masonry, license, war, covetousness, divorce, comes without much condemnation only to those who are enlightened. Verily we are judged. IRA TODD.

A LECTURE NEEDED.

MANKATO, Kans.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—We have many here who are opposed to secrecy, but not organized. There are two copies of the Cynosure coming regularly to our office, and they are read and then given to others. We also loan to those who will read them, such books as "Finney on Masonry," "In the Coils," "Morgan's Exposition," and "A Masonic Conspiracy," and they are beginning to bear fruit. We are talking of getting our worthy State lecturer, Rev. R. Loggan, to give us a lecture. There is now and then a United Brethren preacher that hints at the subject. There is virtually nothing here but what is under the control of the lodge. There are no revivals of religion of any note in the churches, and it is, I believe, because they are controlled by the Christless lodges. There is occasionally a conversion in the M. E. church, but may it not be that the Lord has heard the plaintive cry of some mother (not father) in Israel and thus saved a son or a daughter from sin? Some speak as though they would like to see the lodge ventilated (exposed), and generally end with a "but"; so they are not quite ready for action. May the God of all grace help you in your mission against the lodges and all sin. Yours for the truth.

JUDGMENTS ON EVIL DOERS.

LINVILLE, Iowa, 1885.

In reading a few weeks ago in the Cynosure, of the judgments of God on those that had a hand in the outrage on Bro. Rathbun, at Kellerton, Iowa, brings fresh to our mind that the same Almighty Power has lately brought to naught some of those here who helped furnish eggs for the egging of Bros. S. M. Good and Joel Austin, while exemplifying the Masonic degrees in Friends church, in June, 1880. I refer to the firm here who lately made an assignment. One of the firm who conducted the business, is a Mason and Odd-fellow. Their main clerk is W. M. of Lebanon ▭. The latter, who refused to qualify, has left the county. These by some means, (I leave the readers to judge how) got behind some sixty thousand dollars in a short time, and are paying about 25 cents on the dollar. The balance must have gone for Masonic charity. While another of the firm, a good honest man, and a non-secretist has been robbed of nearly all he had by trusting the above, and being in partnership with those whom he had been warned to be separate from. Him we pity, but think hereafter he will not trust Masons to do business for him. AN OBSERVER.

It is refreshing to hear the expansive ideas of Joseph Cook and his denunciation of narrow patriotism and "parochial statesmen." His slogan is not "Boston for the Bostonians!" or "Halifax for the Haligonians!" or "Canada for the Canadians!" He does not even want America to be reserved for Americans, or Great Britain for Britons. "The world for all mankind, and may the best men win!" seems to be his aspiration. He advocates an imperial federation as the sole alternative for disintegration, which would check cosmopolitanism and foster the narrow provincial spirit which he dislikes. If he dwells upon the commanding position of Great Britain and the United States, and foreshadows their majestic future, he fans the pride of our dominant race only to increase the cordiality between its members and to unite them eventually, if possible, in improving international law, in substituting arbitration for war, and in imposing on the nations of the earth a higher and more beneficent civilization.—Ex.

BIBLE LESSONS.

LESSON IX.—March 1, 1885.—Paul sent to Felix. Acts 23: 12-24.

GOLDEN TEXT.—If any man suffer as a Chsistian, let him not be ashamed. 1 Pet. 4: 16.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. The sin of wicked vows. vs. 12, 13. A wicked vow always involves a double sin:—the guilt of making such a vow and the guilt of keeping it, and the last sin is worse than the first inasmuch as it is more deliberate. This band of conspirators bound themselves by an oath that they might lend the sanction of religion to their diabolical purpose. It is very convenient to a Masonic saloon keeper while plying his murderous traffic to believe in the indissolubly binding nature of his oath, though he may be an infidel. At the same time a close examination of Masonic vows will show that they require the impossible. So these Jews bound themselves by an oath they could not keep. Murder was on their programme, not suicide by the slow and painful process of salvation; and it is likely that they freed themselves very easily from their rash vow in the way provided by the Talmud:—"He that hath made a vow not to eat anything, woe to him if he eat; woe to him if he do not eat! if he eat he sinneth against his vow; if he eat not he sinneth against his life. What must such a man do in this case? Let him go to the wise men and they will loose him from his vow." Far better had they repented and sought absolution in the way provided so mercifully by the Levitical law. Lev. 5: 4-10. It is not well understood by many people that the obligations of the minor orders are in reality oaths, intended to impress the consciences of all who take them with the solemnity of a direct appeal to God. The Good Templar is told that "his vow is registered in Heaven." The Grand Army candidate is made to "solemnly swear in presence of Almighty God." The Grange, "in the presence of the Heavenly Father." The United Sons of Industry, ditto. And like the Masonic oaths they are null and void, as soon as the Holy Spirit convinces men that they are rash, foolish and sinful.

2. Judicial blindness. vs. 14, 15. It may seem strange that the religious heads of the nation should lend themselves thus readily to such a foul conspiracy. But by a long process of rejecting the truth and following their own traditions they had become judically blinded even to the plainest question of morals. There is danger in our own day that a like cause may bring about a like result. It was through this same hardening, blinding process which made these Jewish priests clasp hands with Paul's would-be assassins that ministers of the Gospel justified Morgan's murder in 1826. When Christians see no harm in Masonic oaths, or joining in fraternal covenant with unbelievers they can see no harm in other things equally contrary to God's Word.

3. The overruling Providence. vs. 16-24. One of the most blessed and comforting privileges of the Christian is that of unshaken confidence in God. Pagan Rome was Paul's protector. Worldly men are often unconscious guards around God's saints. "Fret not thyself because of evil doers" is sound philosophy as well as religion, for however the wicked may plot they can never go outside of his eternal decrees.

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

Does God require hard or impossible things? Deu. 10: 12; Mi. 6: 8. Do all false systems of belief require them? What causes judicial blindness? 2 Cor. 4: 4; John 12: 40; Rev. 3: 17. What is the confidence of God's people? Ps. 125: 2; Deu. 33: 27.

PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS.

"Bound themselves under a curse." These violent men bound themselves with a dreadful oath; that is they invoked the curse of God upon themselves if they did not kill Paul, or if they ate or drank anything before they killed him, "that they might fence round their crime with all the sanction of religion." That more than forty persons should unite in such a conspiracy, and should without scruple propose it to the supreme court of the land, seems to a modern almost incredible, but accords with the Jewish opinions and practices of that age. Thus Philo, who is one of the purest religious teachers outside the New Testament, directly justifies the assassination of apostates from Judaism.—Abbott.

"We, or ever he come near, are ready to kill him. The plot was necessary either (1) because the Sanhedrim had lost, under Roman rule, its power to inflict capital punishment; or (2) because, even if they possessed that power, the chief captain was not likely to allow its exercise in the case of a Roman citizen; or (3) because the experience of the previous day had shown that the violent party were not likely to obtain a majority in the council. The plot was so far skilfully laid. Even those who had said, "We find no evil in this man," could hardly oppose a proposal for a further investigation.—Plumptre.

"Bring this young man unto the chief captain." Although Paul had an express promise from Christ of security, that he would escape the snares of the Jews, and bear witness for him at Rome, yet he did not neglect any proper means of safety, thus proving how far removed he was from the character of an enthusiast. His prudence is also here observable; he does not tell the centurion, but thinks it safer to inform the tribune himself.—Gloag. This simple history is most precious as an inspired commentary on some difficult doctrines. It does not, indeed, make the doctrines easy of comprehension; it does not relieve them of mystery to our minds; but it is fitted to show us that no view of the divine purposes can be right that in any measure tends to slacken human zeal and energy. To be assured that it is God that worketh in them, is the best of all motives to induce intelligent Christians to work out their own salvation with fear and trembling.—Arnot.

The Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them (Ps. 34: 7); (1) As a comforting vision; (2) as a tender friend in the person of Paul's nephew; (3) as a powerful body-guard in the form of the Roman soldiers (comp. 2 Kings 6: 17, where the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha).—Lange.

Other sinners serve the devil for pay; but cursers and swearers are volunteers who get nothing for their pains.—Boston.

If you have promised what is wrong, be unfaithful to your promise; if your vow be evil, abandon your determination; for that promise must needs be impious which can only be performed by your acting wickedly.—Isidore.

He that sweareth to his own hurt should keep his oath, but not he that makes an oath to hurt others.—Peloubet.

Ver. 15. He that will swear will very seldom hesitate to lie. Vices are social and go in companies.—Peloubet.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.

2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.

3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.

4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.

5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.

6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.

7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.

8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.

9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.

10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.

11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.

12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.

13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.

14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.

15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1885.

WHEN THE ANCONDA has swallowed an animal, the snake becomes gorged, and helpless. If attacked it lashes the ground with its extremities, and shows wrath and ferocity proportionate to its weakness. So it is with "that old serpent which is the devil and and Satan." How the serpent of slavery made the continent rock and reel under its lashings! Because, all the time, it felt week before free labor. But like the gorged anaconda, it got its throat cut. So will the serpents of the still and lodge. They are now being gorged!

Our lives through various scenes are drawn
And vexed with trifling cares:
Whi c God's eternal thought moves on
His undisturbed affairs."

But the Spirit of God is an "Eternal Spirit;" and when we are "filled with the Spirit," that being eternal, time and eternity meet and blend in our bosom, and we repose the troubled inquietude of our spirits upon the deep tranquility of his; and so we enjoy heaven without waiting for death.

Show me thy way, O Lord; teach me thy path's. Ps. 25: 4
Thy way is in the sea, and thy path in the great waters; and thy footsteps are not known. Ps. 77: 19.
Touching the Almighty we cannot find him out. Job 37: 23.

Why then should David pray God to show him what, in the nature of the case, cannot be known by mortals whose minds are finite? Does the Bible deal in puzzles and contradictions? Or is one part inspired, and the other not? No, in nowise. "All Scripture is given by Inspiration of God;" and every part is consistent with every other part. This is the explanation.

There are two sorts of God's ways: those for himself, and those for us, and both kinds "are everlasting." Who could have known, prior to fact, his way of abolishing slavery? why he permits sin? or, how he will make it work for good? These are his own infinite, unknowable ways, in which himself walks.

Then there is a way which he would do, if he should undertake our duty for us, every day. That way we can know and do; for the Holy Spirit who is sent for the asking, will lead us and "show us things to come." David prayed to know just what God would do were he to undertake his (David's) duty! This he learned, and said: "My feet have held his steps and not declined." Magnificent!

We have an interesting letter from Secretary Stoddard at Boston. The Republican wrath at those who voted for St. John, and the terrible cold weather dampened his ardor a little but he pushed steadily onward. As our annual meeting at Chicago comes toward the last of June, a general meeting in New England, such as was projected a year ago, should not be later than May, if it is to precede the Chicago rally. Lost opportunities cannot be fully retrieved, but the alacrity with which thousands have petitioned against the profanation of the Washington Monument, shows how much can be done in a little time. And Senator Pomeroy's estimate of the value of a New England meeting in western Massachusetts is none too high. Ten thousand names would secure the ablest speakers, and a crowded convention. Ten or twelve papers would publish and endorse the call.

GENERAL J. W. PHELPS.

This gentleman, who died in Guilford, Vermont, Feb. 1st, 1885, is thus naively noticed by the old Springfield (Mass.) Republican:

"A picturesque and sturdy Vermont character passes from sight in the death of Gen. John W. Phelps, until recently of Brattleboro. He was best known as the head of the national Anti-masonic ticket in 1880, but will also be remembered as the first general to arm and equip slaves against their masters. This and an accompanying emancipation proclamation, led the confederate government to declare him an outlaw. He was not sustained at Washington in these acts and so resigned and returned home. Commanding in presence, bluff and eccentric in manner, having the heart of a woman, and with an unquenchable hatred for secret organizations, he will long be remembered as a prominent figure in his State.

This interesting man, patriot, scholar, soldier and gentleman, will be long remembered by the readers of the Cynosure. "The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance" (Ps. 112: 6), and General Phelps was an eminently righteous man. He was sent by his parents to West Point when a youth in his teens, and continued, with one interval, in the United States army service till he resigned his commission while commanding under Butler at New Orleans. It was while there he undertook to arm the slaves who thronged to our armies. Seeing himself surrounded by these able-bodied men, capable of endurance and inspired with zeal and courage by the hopes of freedom, Gen. Phelps resolved to arm them. Butler, who offered his command to suppress negro insurrections as soon as he got within the slave States, remonstrated. "General" said the shrewd political commander-in-chief in New Orleans: "General, the wood on that island is worth six dollars a cord in the streets of the city. Set your darkies to cutting and hauling that wood. You can make a small fortune by it."

"I am fighting," replied Phelps, "against a rebellion which rests on unrequited labor; and I will not share with the rebels the spoils of oppression."

As the fugitives came in, in great numbers, and had to be maintained by the United States, it looked so utterly preposterous to maintain them in idleness or send them back to help the rebellion, he resolved to arm them, not doubting that the President and Secretary Stanton saw as he did; but supposed they were kept from arming the blacks by policy, and that they would wink at a little irregularity for the great good which they could do the country and the cause. He was mistaken. Stanton was not the man to allow the least trespass on his prerogative. He countermanded Phelp's order. Mr. Lincoln sustained his Secretary, and greatly to Butler's regret, Phelps threw up his commission; and though he was popular with the troops, and longed for the service, he was too proud to cringe and supplicate, and entered the army no more.

When the war broke out the Vermonters rallied at Burlington. A regiment was extemporized at once, and while the sons of Stark and Ethan Allen were perplexed to find some one to drill and put them into shape. They found Colonel Phelps at the hotel and put him at once at their head. Arrived at New York provision was made for the officers to ride through the city in carriages. But Colonel Phelps kept his saddle and would not leave the soldiers, but marched with them through the city. He was alwsys popular with the rank and file, more than with his superior officers, who did not like his self-poised positiveness. He was a good military scholar, and an able commandant, and an enthusiast for the country. and the suppression of the rebellion.

We shall give further account of his character and work.

ENGLAND'S DILEMMA.

In a speech at Aylesbury, England, on the 20th of September, 1876, D'Israeli, Lord Beaconsfield, the great Tory premier whom Gladstone succeeded, said:

"In the attempt to conduct the government of this world, there are new elements to be considered which our predecessors had not to deal with. We have not only to deal with emperors, princes, and ministers, but there are the secret societies—an element which we must take into consideration, which at the last moment may baffle all our arrangements, which have their agents everywhere, which have reckless agents, which countenance assassination, and which, if necessary, can produce a massacre."

This oracular speech has been remarkably fulfilled during the administration of Beaconfield's successor. Mr. Gladstone has for more than two years been in a struggle with the secret societies of Ireland, which have assassinated his trusted officers and have just attempted a Guy Fawke's explosion of the Parliament buildings. He has now to grapple with a foe more dreadful though more remote—a secret society in which the extremest religious fanaticism is combined with the most perfect subjection to the oaths of the society.

The successes of the Arabs in Egypt, even if we have yet the good fortune to be assured of General Gordon's safety, have concentrated their power and united the fortunes of nearly all those hitherto friendly to the El Madhi ("the Messiah). The Mohammedan revolt is thus powerfully affecting millions of followers of the False Prophet, if the report on our second page be true, in India as well as western Asia and northern Africa. Will England grapple with this power or will she withdraw from a contest already unprofitable, and in every aspect likely to be more so? A strong party, even among the Liberals in Parliament are calling for a peaceful settlement with the Mahdi. Gordon's release can be more easily bought with money than with blood. This has been Gladstone's disposition, and possibly caused the delay which is everywhere condemned. On the other hand the national clamor for the protection by arms of British soldiers and British bonds has made itself felt in the Cabinet council. Gen. Wolseley has been given entire charge of the campaign.

It must not be forgotten that other nations of Europe are marking jealously every step England is taking; nor is it at all unlikely that the approach of an English army was the direct cause of the capture of Khartoum. It aroused and concentrated the Arab force which unprovoked might never have attacked the city.

THE COST OF FREE-MASONRY.

Two facts in reference to Masonry have seemed difficult of comprehension to the unsophisticated. The first is the cost of Grand Lodges; and the second, why Masons continue in the order for so small benefit and at such vast expense.

The first of these can be answered by looking over the items of the Grand Lodge report for Iowa, for the year 1883-4. The total receipts were $28,747.46. The total expenses were $26,688.77. This last is made up of the following items:

Services of Grand officers	$2,300.00
Expenses of same	343.24
Expenses of Committees	563.93
General expenses incuding per diem of members attending G. L. at $6 a day	5,106.75
Mileage of same	4,169.75
Special appropriations [to officers]	1,571.10
Dues refunded	234.00
Paid Ham & Carrer, [not in charity]	400.00
Cash paid Library Committee	12,000 00
Total	$26,688.77

There was less than $2,000 in the charity fund. It is easy to see why Grand Lodge officers and delegates should think membership is desirable. It is not difficult to understand why those who aspire to such positions should remain in the order; but why the rank and file, who have nothing to hope for should continue thus to be bled (in the name of charity) for the benefit of Grand Lodge officers is a mystery unsolved.

—The Birmingham Free Press has very properly dropped its lodge notices.

—Fort Dearbon Odd-fellow lodge of this city lately held a kind of "lodge of sorrow" for the late Schuyler Colfax. Rev. Frank M. Bristol, a Methodist clergyman, made the leading address of the evening.

—The severe storm of last week prevented Bro. Hinman from proceeding to Indiana as he had proposed. Last Saturday he visited Englewood and made an appointment in the Swedish Lutheran church, to be filled on the 19th. He also preached for Bro. Spaulding of the Free Methodist church on 53d street, Chicago.

—The local papers of Tonawanda, Cherry Creek, Cattaraugus and other points in New York, visited by S. E. Starry and the New York State Agent, are generally edited by jack Masons of the handiest kind. The charge of perjury they bandy with great flippancy, and one brave scribbler thinks the two brethren should have been tarred and feathered at least.

—Secretary Stoddard has been afflicted with a severe cold ever since he reached New England, which has almost prevented his speaking at any of the meetings; and the lack of interest in the reform has been quite discouraging. The severe weather has, of course, prevented greatly the attendance at the conventions, and the very short time given for the Massachusetts meeting must account in part for its meager roll. Bro. Stoddard is this week in Washington.

—Last week we printed a description of a Masonic "lodge of sorrow" which shows how much like ancient and modern pagans the Masons perform when they are especially pious in their way. The description formed part of the sermon in the College church, Wheaton, two weeks ago. Pastor Chittenden has kindly written out the whole of this discourse on idolatry, except the part already printed. It is a clear, strong statement of the whole case, which none can afford to omit reading carefully.

—A letter was lately received at this office from C. S. Woodruff, (Rev.) "Most Worthy Templar" of the "Supreme Council, Templars of Honor and Temperance," asking, as a "personal favor," that the dozen or more copies of the Cynosure containing articles for and against his order months ago, be hunted up and forwarded—without a word respecting any pay for the papers or the trouble in finding them! The N. C. A. has always been liberal in a lawful way, but cannot afford quite so much for the accommodation of the most worthy supremes of any lodge.

—The Catholic press are confident that their long battle over the "freedom-of-worship" bill in New York will soon be succeeded by victory, and the hospitals, prisons, and other places where religious worship is maintained at public expense, will opeu to the priest. When they succeed what shall prevent the Masonic order with its "impressive" and "solemn" religious ceremonies from demanding freedom of worship also. The few Freemasons whose grips and wiuks are vainly used to save them from the punishment of law, ought to have the comfort of a Hiramite ceremony.

OHIO WORK.

Report of the Sec'y of the Ohio Christian Association for the month of January. In answer to a large number of circulars and blank pledges sent out there has been received in cash and pledges for the year, the amount of $177.00—$12.00 of it cash from the following persons: Robert George, $5.00; J. N. Logan, $1.00; W. C. Willson, $1.00; Mrs. Dr. J. A. Bingham, $5.00. The above is pretty fair for the first month; let others send in their pledges or cash at once. We believe we shall be able to put a State lecturer in the field by the first of April.

S. A. GEORGE, Secy.

A QUESTION FOR SECEDERS.

I am in search of more light in Masonry. A short time ago I received notice from the Oakland lodge notifying me to pay my past dues. Now, if I don't pay them, Masonry will cry, "dishonest." God tells me that I am his, and what he has entrusted in my care is his. Now can I take God's money and pay to the Masonic lodge, which means to the devil? Will the readers of the Cynosure please help me out of this difficulty? According to my light on the matter I can't pay it. I am like the apostle Paul, O miserable man that I am, who can deliver me out of the hands of Masonry? I praise God that Christ Jesus has delivered me. D. BENJAMIN.

LITERATURE.

The Book-lover's Rosary, charmingly bound in gilt, is a little pocket volume of 80 pages in which some laborious editor has gathered the "praise of books in the words of famous writers of all ages," from Socrates to Dobson. Such a volume is a delightful companion for a few hours as one journeys, or to take up at any spare moment at home or in the office. John B. Alden, New York. Price 30c.

A Prominent and valuable feature of the midwinter St. Nicholas is Gail Hamilton's "English Kings in a Nutshell." The talented author has here given in easy flowing verse a comprehensive view of all the English sovereigns, with the principal eveuts and distinguished personages of their reigns. Portraits of nearly every persou mentioned, with many other illustrations, accompany the descriptive text, "Ralph's Winter Carnival" is a finely illustrated article telling of a boy's winter visit to Montreal. Edmond Alton continues his reminisences of the U. S. Senate and tells a droll story of Charles Sumner's absent-mindedness. Mrs. Clement's "Stories of Art Artists" tells about the great Spanish painter, Murrillo.

The March Century will contain an article on the Soudan, written by Gen. R. E. Colston, formerly of the Confederate army, and later on the general staff of the Egyptian army. In the latter service he commanded two expeditions of exploration in the Souand, traveling on all the principal caravan routes, and spending two years in the towns and among the tribes which are frequently mentioned in connection with El Mahdi's rebellion. The article will be illustrated with more than twenty pictures.

The English Illustrated Magazine continues the entertaining account of "Shakspeare's Country", with illustrations of Wixford, Exhall, the Dingles near Stratford, etc. "Naworth Castle" reveals to the modern reader the appearance within and without of the old baronial castles of the Scottish border, one of which is yet in such a state of preservation as to be the pleasant habitation of men. A fine series of illustrations accompany the article. The rest of the number is occupied by the drama and novels.

Literary Life is making a rapid growth towards that degree of perfection which has been attained in magazine literature at the East. Its table of contents is very attractive: Portrait of Hiram Powers, by Roger Cunniugham; "To Hiram Powers," autograph poem by John Quincy Adams, President U. S. A. (reproduced from Hiram Powers' Autograph Album); "Stoke Pogis Park," by Frank Bromley, illustrating Gray's Elegy; "Hiram Powers;" "Thomas Gray;" "The Boston Group," by Arthur E. Cotton; the poem, "Drifting." by T. Buchanan Read; "Anecdotes of Authors," by Will M. Clemens; "Editor's Gossip; "A Texas Excursion," by F. A. Conant and W. S. Abbot; "Thoughts on Study, Reading and Refinement;" "Out in the Cold;" Guntherz, delineator, illustrated poem on B. Riviere's picture of "The Collie Dogs; "George and the Stranger,," by Jane Grey Swisshelm," a reminiscence of the war; "The Analyst's Mistake," a poem, by Carlotta Perry; "The Human Face," a poem, by Ella Wheeler; "The Pigeon Hole," by Robert J. Burdette; "Sour Drops," by W. A. Taylor.

Vicks Magazine for February maintains in the midst of storm and cold its charming discriptions and talks about the flowers and shrubs that adorn the summer, and gladden the dearth of winter within doors. Articles on Mirror Lake, Cal., buried seeds, a handsome flower stand, the cold grapery, etc., will repay the reader. Rochester, N. Y.

THE MONUMENT PROTEST.

OBERLIN TO SHERMAN.

On another page you will find the form of remonstrance adopted for this place, to which I obtained a hundred names of its principal citizens. All the members of the college faculty signed except one or two whom I failed to see. Three or four Masons signed it, as they did not believe in the principle of entrusting such dedication services in the hands of any particular organization. The member of the faculty who drafted the remonstrance thought the one sent to me was not broad enough, so I suggested to him to write one, which he did. As it was rather late it was thought best that I should send the list of names direct to Mr. Sherman, which I do to-day; and as coming directly from Oberlin it was thought that it would have more weight. W. BURR.

TABOR COLLEGE, IOWA.

I send you a few names and could have secured many more if I had had time. All our professors and our pastor signed. The professors names are F. W. Fairfield, W. B. Payne, J. E. Todd, Thos. McClelland, L. J. Nettleton, E. B. Geer, G. S. Houghton. JOHN TODD.

MONMOUTH.

I have received about 150 signatures to the remonstrances which you sent me, and I have sent them to Washington. I could have obtained a great many more if time had permitted.—DAVID THOMPSON.

A GERMAN COLLEGE.

On the list are the names of five professors of Elmhurst College. Inspector Goebel did not think it proper for minors to sign so important a paper. Otherwise I could have got the signatures of 80 or 90 students in addition. —F. J. T. FISCHER (M. D.)

SOUTHERN COLLEGES.

I have circulated the remonstrance and secured twenty names of good citizens. I copied the remonstrance on two separate papers, sending one to Maryville College, and the other to Tusculum College. There will be half a dozen or more at each place who will sign it. Trusting it will check the impudence of the lodge, I am very truly, —FRANCIS M. ALLEN, Knoxville College, Tenn.

NORFOLK, VA., MISSION SCHOOL.

Inclosed find the signatures of the teachers in our school. Hope the remonstrance may be successful. We are engaged in the freedmen's work. Our enrollment is over 1,000, with daily average of over 600. Have been in operation only two years. Wishing you success, I remain,—M. CLARKE.

FROM ALABAMA.

I send the names of forty petitioners to be presented in opposition to Masonic mummery over the nation's monument. If I had more time I could procure hundreds of names. Such heathenish stuff ought not to be allowed in any civilized country.—JESSE WARD.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., MINISTERS.

I found some professed Anti-masons who were afraid to sign lest vengeance should be visited upon their heads! What is to become of our American manhood if a secret order can trammel freemen's hands and lips? Enclosed find list of 54 names, two Congregational, one Baptist, one Methodist, and one United Presbyterian minister, and two M. D.'s included. I could do better if I had more time.—ALBERT M. PAULL.

THE CROWNING ACT OF MASONRY.

I spent three days and got plenty of curses, but did not care for that. But the worst I got used was by those who profess better things than infidels. The same old story was repeated, "Masonry cannot be so bad, for my minister would not belong to such a gang as you say the Masons are." The Masons say to dedicate the Monument is the crowning act of their lives and they expect to get more notoriety by this display than all others combined, and say further that no one else is competent to perform the job.—LUTHER LANDON.

MEN OF MARK.

Enclosed I send 32 names, including two presiding elders, two Presbyterian ministers, three ruling elders, four bankers, and four high school teachers.—S. S. GRANNIS, Red Wing, Minn.

59, UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

As soon as the Cynosure with remonstrance came I set about securing names, and did the best I could amid cares and sickness. I send a list of 59 names, and trust that Masonic audacity and impudent intrusion may receive merited rebuke.—J. W. DILL, (Pastor Ref. Pres. church), Mediapolis, Ia.

INSUFFERABLE MASONIC ARROGANCE.

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat occasionally hits the Masons. A few weeks ago it said of their desire to run the dedication of the Washington Monument, that Masonry was a pretty big thing and the head of the secret society business, but that it was intolerable to have them thrusting themselves forward on all such occasions, county, State or National, where no sect or denomination should intrude, much less the Masons with their insufferable arrogance.—JOHN E. HOLMES, Baldwin, Ill.

A THOUSAND EASY.

If you had sent me a number of protests, with the assistance of others I could have as easily raised a thouand namcs as the the number I now send you. Send me at least twelve blanks next time.—E O. CLAY, Ridgeville, Ohio.

DANGEROUS BUSINESS.

I was often told that I was engaged in a dangerous business. Imagination speaks stronger than pen can describe. It was like taking the enemy by the throat. I succeeded in getting a few names.—JAMES HART, Monroe, Iowa.

ANOTHER THOUSAND.

I return the remonstrance with 54 signers, all voters but one. Almost every man signed it to whom it was presented. If I had had time I could have got a thousand names. Am glad of the movement to stop Masonic impudence in their maneuvers around public buildings and monuments.—C. QUICK, Weston, Mich.

AND ANOTHER.

Thousands could be got with time. I would suggest, as the Masons have seized upon this great national event to advertise their heathenish mummeries, we take the same opportunity to expose the heathenism of the lodge by having thousands of little leaflets like the heading of this remonstrance, or something similar, distributed among the vast crowds on that occasion.—GEO. W. CLARK, Detroit, Mich.

TWENTY-TWO.

We bid you God speed. I have here 22 names. We are trying to work against the lodge here in Salem, praying in the prayer meeting that God will overthrow lodgery and secret societies of every kind, and distributing tracts.—DARWIN NELSON, Salem, Mich.

AGE ENLISTED.

The list is a small one; on account of age and infirmity I could not get round or I could have got many more.—J. W. BALDRIDGE, SR., Cherry Fork, O.

ONE MORE TO THE CHURCH ROLL.

Enclosed find a list of subscribers obtained in a hurry as you requested. Hope that the secret order will be defeated in their attempt to dedicate the monument. I read you paper with interest. You can add the Baptist church of Strykersville, Wyoming Co., N. Y., to the list of churches that prohibit Masonry.—I. H. WOOSTER, Strykersville, N. Y.

SNOW-BOUND.

The roads are full of snow so that I could not travel or I should have had more. Hoping that the cause may prevail.—J. W. SWAN, LaSalle, Ill.

AFRAID.

I ought to have ten times as many, but the lodge has such an influence people are positively afraid; and I confess I have some fears of rushing into the arms of a bear myself. O may God hasten the time when men shall have courage to stand up and face the grim monster, Masonry!—E. S. GRATTAN, Clayton, Mich.

THE TIME SHORT.

Could I have had the remonstrance two weeks ago I could have secured a large list.—JOSEPH POWERS, Harford, Pa.

I could have got 50 or 75 names, but I had only two hours to do what I have done.—J. M. FRY, Ligonier, Ind.

Had there been time we might have secured many more. [over 50 sent]—W. W. TEMPLETON, Huntsville, O.

With more time I could have got as many more. I hope the names protesting will be legion.—JASON F. AMES, Reed's Landing, Minn.

I had but three hours to get my list in.—J. W. SUIDTER, Sharon, Wis.

Could have obtained more but for limited timc.—D. HYDE, Oxford, Kan.

I have succeeded in getting the names of some of our best townspeople and could get a great many more were the time not so limited.—Mrs. LEVANTIA GREENE, Willett, N. Y.

NONE REFUSED.

No one that I asked refused to sign the remonstrance. Could have got a great many more if I had had time. Truly yours for a pure Christianity.—GEO. W. CHAMP, Cambridge City, Ind.

Every body signs that I ask in Clinton township, Iowa. —S. HEATON.

The protest met with favor by all he [Bro. Edgerly] presented it to. Not one objected to signing.—WM. C. BISSELL, Humboldt, Neb

THE HOME.

GIVING AND TAKING.

BY JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER.

Smoothing soft the nestling head
Of a maiden fancy-led,
Thus a grave-eyed woman said:

"Richest gifts are those we make,
Dearer than the love we take
That we give for love's own sake.

"Well I know the heart's unrest;
Mine has been the common quest
To be loved and therefore blest.

"Favors undeserved were mine;
At my feet as on a shrine
Love has laid its gifts divine.

"Sweet the offerings seemed, and yet
With their sweetness came regret,
And a sense of unpaid debt.

"Heart of mine unsatisfied,
Was it vanity or pride
That a deeper joy denied?

"Hands that ope but to receive
Empty close; they only live
Richly who can richly give.

"Still," she sighed with moistening eyes,
"Love is sweet in any guise;
But its best is sacrifice!

"He who, giving, does not crave
Likest is to Him who gave
Life itself the loved to save.

"Love that self-forgetful gives
Sows surprise of ripened sheaves,
Late or soon its own receives."

ENLARGING THE BARNS.

If you are a Christian you know the richness and fullness of the Christian life; you feel oftentimes that this life affords but slender scope for the full enjoyment of its privileges, and the feeling will come to you, "What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits and my goods?"

You feel that you have capacities and needs and destinies which are not served by the mere feeding of a worldly life. It is pleasant to engage in the intercourse and gaity of social scenes. There is a subtler life which wants a bread which pleasure cannot find, and which industry cannot win, nor money purchase. A life which finds no room in the mere orbit of the senses, which has cravings which are not to be fed upon excitement, and destinies which lie beyond the pastimes and the prizes of the earth. And the heart of this life will sometimes beat with aspirations which no applause can satisfy, and flutter with anxieties no lover's arm can soothe, no lover's lip can pass away. You want more room than the counting-house or the pleasure scene can give, for this higher life. Then, pull down your barns and build greater. Build barns big enough to hold the earth-life and soul-life both; barns in which you can bestow all your fruit and your goods. You are not called on to give up anything, but to include all. Pull down your barns in the shape of self-trust, and build greater by trusting all to Christ, who only hath immortality.

Fill in the counsels we have no time to elaborate for you, for yourself. Christ is your life: and if you lean on him in all things, you will find he is able to keep all that you commit to him, aud you shall have life more abundantly. Not less pleasure, but more; not less profit, but more. The little barn of self is not roomy enough. Pull it down and live in Christ. "Not I, but Christ liveth in me. And the life I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me."—Mursell.

SAVE FOR THE LORD.

You may go through the world hurting the feelings of your neighbors, jostling their elbows, hustliug them aside ruthlessly; you may be niggardly and churlishly resolved to keep your contributions down to the minimum on every occasion, you may starve your own soul, but—you are frugal—you are possessed of the genius for accumulation, you are able to make a brave show, and to spend as lavishly for your personal gratification as you stint meanly when the Lord's cause appeals to you.

The very alphabet of this training in an overpraised virtue is taught the child when its wee hand is made to drop bits of silver into a bank for the mere purpose of saving money that may by-and-by be placed in a larger bank. The child's bank is in the shape of a house, or a frog, or a money-jug, and, if I had my way, it should be sternly abolished in every house, unless it should take the form of one of the little boxes issued by our mission boards, and the little owner taught to save money that he might blissfully and blessedly give it away.

One meets this over-praised frugality at every turn. "Go to such a seamstress. She is a widow struggling on to support her child. She would make a dress for almost nothing, her necessity is so great. It will be a charity to give her something to do, and you may never have such a chance again." This was said to me a few days ago, and the person speaking was quite unconscious that she was shockingly heartless, and was recommending a heartless action.

"I would have some of my fancy work done by such or such a one," says Mrs. Millionaire, "but my nieces have time on their hands, and I can let them make these pretty things and keep the money in the family." Whereas to get the money out of the family and into some other family who are perishing for lack of it, would be the wise and Christian thing to do.

Here and there we find a spendthrift soul which needs to be taught that honesty and charity should both begin at home; but most of us are far more in need of tutoring in that systematic and generous giving which would forward the Lord's work with a mighty impulse and clothe the church with the beauty of holiness.—Christian Intelligencer.

"DOWN BREAKS" ON EXTRAVAGANCE.

The besetting sin of the American people to-day is an inordinate and ungovernable desire for display. To outshine our neighbors in dress, furniture, equipages, splendid table service and dinners, seaside and mouutain cottages, magnificent parties, costly music and wonderful catering, seems to be the supreme and absorbing passion of multitudes of men and women. It is this craze which is doing more than anything else to sap the honor, honesty, and spiriuality of the people, while it is also the source of endless physical evils and vast unhappiness.

The extravagance to which the love of finery leads often converts the husband and father into a beast of burden, condemning him to toil and struggle all his life long, without hope of ever getting anything ahead, and of obtaining the means of needed rest in old age and broken health. If he is a day laborer, that extra silk dress for his wife, or that extra set of jewelry for his daughter—both of which were absolutely unnecessary, nor would have been thought of had not an equally ambitious and poor neighbor set the example—will drive him to unusual piece work for which he really has not the strength, or will discount his regular wages for months in advance. If he is a farmer, that fine pair of road horses and flashing carriage, purchased along with other needless things in order to enable the family to vie with somebody else, may end in fixing a mortgage on the farm, which is added to from time to time, until the home goes under the auctioneer's hammer. What sweat, what gnawing anxieties, what wretchedness of despair follow many a fond and too indulgent head of a household, because, forsooth, his family hunger and thirst with remorseless energy after luxuries and fripperies which they know well enough cannot be afforded, and yet which they exact from him whom they see fairly dying with overwork and mental strain on purpose to gratify their vanity.

Nor is this all. The business man who might make a comfortable support for his wife and children, and provide a cheerful, happy, and lasting home, if their desires could only be moderated according to his income, and they had only learned the wholesome lesson of contentment, is often tempted to engage in outside and dangerous speculations in order to restore his capital, which has been wasted by extravagance, or to grasp the enlarged profits, which have become necessary to meet the ever-growing wants of those dependent on him. Debt stares him in the face, ruin threatens; meanwhile the dresses, the jewelry, the dinner entertainments must multiply as usual; so to meet all these expenditures, he takes immense risks iu Wall street, borrows other people's money under false pretenses, possibly embezzles trust funds, or forges, or does some other criminal act in his desperatiou, and suddenly goes down with a crash, forfeiting forever his precious good name, disgracing his family, aud casting, it may be, reproach on religion. Snch cases are, alas! only too common, and they are the melancholy commentary on the stupendous folly and recklessness of liviug beyond one's means. Well did the wise man utter the warning: "Pride goeth before a fall."

But supposing the husband and father is not made a bankrupt, nevertheless this insane passion for display produces disastrous effects on character. Here, indeed, is an evil as inevitable as it is deep and serious. The members of a community who are bent on surpassing one another in "style," who feel mortified to the point of dying unless they are in the pink of fashion, are themselves the victims of the most demoralizing vanity, of utterly worldly, selfish and belittling influences. It is plain to the keen observer of human nature that a woman wholly absorbed in the effort to make a "show" is a monster of mingled cunning and cruelty. For this she is willing to sacrifice the character of her children, the business of her husband, her own happiness, and all the highest duties she owes to the best welfare of society and the glory of God. When "style" fastens its greedy and remorseless fangs upon the human heart it sucks the life-blood of piety, and paralyzes the sources of sober thoughts and upright action. What we need just now is more of the gospel of honest, simple living, of homely fare, of plain clothing, of unostentatious, yet comfortable homes. Let us so live as not to consume completely each day's earnings, or what is still worse, mortgage the future, but so as to lay something by to have a goodly portion of honest money to help forward charitable objects, to feel happy and contented with our lot, and to leave an honorable and worthy name in this world when leaving it for a grander realm beyond.—Christian at Work.

All rivers, small or large, agree in one characteristic: they like to lean a little on one side; they cannot bear to have their channels deepest in the middle, but will always, if they can, have one bank to sun themselves upon, and another to get cool under; one shingly shore to play over, where they may be shallow, and shore-foolish, and child-like; another steep, under which they can pause, and purify themselves, and get their strength of waves fully together for due occasion.

Rivers in this way are just like wise men, who keep one side of their life for play and another for work, and can be brilliant, and chattering, and transparent, when they are at ease, and yet take deep counsel on the other side when they set themselves to their main purpose. And rivers are just in this divided, also, like wicked and good men: the good rivers have serviceable, deep places along their banks, that ships can sail in; but the wicked rivers go scooping irregularly under their banks, until they get full of struggling eddies, which no boat can row over without being twisted against the rocks, and pools like wells, which no one can get out of but the water-kelpie that lives at the bottom. But wicked or good, the rivers all agree in having two kinds of sides.—Ruskin.

THE SNOW-STORM.

In the upper regions,
By companies and legions,
The vapors collected in crowds,
And counseled and blustered,
And marshaled and mustered,
And formed themselves into clouds.

Down from the other world,
Down to the nether world,
Silently, solemn, and slow,
Soft as the eider-down,
Light as a spider-gown,
Came the beautiful snow.

Then faster and faster,
Till over the pasture,
Over the ponds and the lakes,
Over the meadow-lots,
Over the garden-plots,
Lay the beautiful flakes.

Then with the snowing,
Puffing and blowing,
Old Boreas came bellowing by,
Till over the by-ways,
And over the high-ways,
The snow-drifts were ever so high.

—Little Sower.

THE MYSTERY OF THE SNOW-FLAKE.

The winter night sets in clear and cold. A biting wind blows out of the northwest. The stars glitter in the frosty air. The wheel of a passing cart screams in the crisp and powdery snow. By morning the pavement will be covered with rime, the pond and the brook with ice, the window-panes with stars and crystal foliage; or the whole land will have clothed itself in a mantle of new fallen snow, white, pure, and cold.

When the snow falls quietly without much wind, catch the great feathery flakes on your sleeve, and look at their shapes before they melt. They are not always alike, but oftenest the flakes consist of little wheels having six spokes and no rim. They are clear, transparent bits of ice, rather less than one-fourth of an inch in diameter, and thin as paper. Several hundred varieties of these snow crystals have been observed, and their figures drawn, and yet almost all show the same six-sided or six-rayed form All these forms are made from the same substance, frozen water; with heat all will dissolve into the same substance, liquid water.

Now what do we know about water?

The chemist procures a certain kind of gas which he calls hydrogen. Hydrogen is very light, so that it takes the upper place in anything which contains it. You can keep it only in an inverted vessel; it is invisible; it will burn freely in the air with a faint, purple-blue light. Put a bell-glass full of it down over a lighted candle; the candle will go out, but the gas will light at the mouth of the bell, with a puff, and will continue to burn there. As the bell is raised up, the candle may be lighted again by the burning glass.

He also procures some oxygen. This is likewise a gas, invisible, a little heavier than air, so that it will not stay in an inverted jar, like hydrogen. It will not burn, but a candle lowered into it burns fiercely; a bit of burning charcoal fills a jar with showers of brilliant sparks; sulphur burns with a lambent blue flame; iron of steel wire sparkles more brilliantly and more abundantly than charcoal, and burns like tinder; while phosphorus glows in a globe filled with oxygen, like a newly risen sun.

Suppose, now, that we have a tin tube nine inches long and one inch in diameter. Let us fill three inches of the tube with oxygen, and the remaining six inches with hydrogen, and stop its mouth with a cork. The two gases are mixed in the tubes, but are not combined. If we touch fire to them through a small hole which we have made for the purpose, they combine at once with an explosion; the cork is driven out with much noise; if the vessel was large it might burst; but if stroug enough to withstand the pressure and to retain the exploding gases, we should find afterward in it a small quantity of water.

We must always combine two measures of hydrogen for every measure of oxygen; two pints or two gallons for one pint or one gallon. If there is any surplus of either, that will remain over, uncombiued. Why?

We suppose that the pint of oxygen contains a great multitude of minute particles, which we call atoms. Each atom is too small to be seen by eye, or by the microscope; it cannot be divided; it is probably round or rounded. A pint of hydrogen is supposed to contain an equal number of hydrogen atoms the same size as oxygen atoms, and similarly shaped, but each oxygen atom weighs sixteen times as much as an atom of hydrogen.

The atoms of oxygen and hydrogen have a great affection for each other. A slight impulse makes and hold each other with the firmest grasp; but each atom of oxygen takes possession of two atoms of hydrogen. The fire gives the necessary impulse to the nearest atoms; they communicate the movement to those next, and so it moves on with the speed of lightning, until all are brought together. Now, it follows, of course, that when every atom of oxygen has found its two atoms of hydrogen, any surplus of hydrogen must be left uncombined. Don't you see that if there should be five gentlemen and eleven ladies in a room, and each gentleman should walk out with a lady on each arm, there would yet be left one lady alone by herself? or if there were six ladies and four gentlemen, that there would be two ladies apiece for only three of the gentlemen?

The combination of one atom of oxygen with two atoms of hydrogen forms one particle of water.

Now, see what all this has to do with the way frost forms a snow-flake. Put three round things, peas, shot, or marbles, down side by side as closely as you can, and see if they do not make a triangle, thus: _. The three sides are equal, for the three atoms are of the same size. So then, each particle of water—like the atoms, too small to be seen in any way—is a minute, thin triangle of equal sides.

The force which joins the atoms of oxygen and hydrogen is called affinity. There is another force which tends to hold together two particles of water. which is called cohesion- It fastens many partieles of the same sort into one mass. But there is still another force which comes between the particles, striving to keep them asunder, and this force is heat. Heat and cohesion are sworn foes; as one or the other gets the mastery, the form of the substance is changed. If cohesion overcomes, the particles of water eling together with such force as to become a solid mass, which we call ice; if heat has almost, but not quite the mastery, the water is fluid; if heat conquers, the partieles fly from each other in steam; they fill whatever vessel they happen to be in.

The air is full of partieles of water in the form of vapor or steam. But the cold wind blows and takes away the heat which kept the particles apart, and the cohesion begins to gather them together again. Bit by bit they come and each arranges itself beside its fellow in a certain way, which they all very well know. How many such equal-sided triangles can you gather round one point? Just six, to be sure, and they make together a regular six-sided figure which we call a hexagon. From each of the six sides we may build out lines; arranging the triangles side by side, and by regular additions may make multitudes of beautiful patterns, in each of which the corresponding parts shall always be alike. So it is with the snow crystals. The designs are many, but the lines which form them always make with each other the angles of an equal-sided triangle, or the double of those angles.

The air in a room is full of water particles. As they float against the window pane on a cold night, the heat is withdrawn from them, aud they join each other upon the surface of the glass. Each lies beside his fellow, making always the same angle, and so branching in never-endiug variety of graceful foliage, or in star-shaped patterns.

The water in the bowl begins to chill; a crystal of ice joins the side of the bowl; auother follows, and another, forming a little beam of ice, which always adheres to the side at the angle of an equal-sided triangle. This beam shoots out further and further on the surface of the water, growing broader and thicker, as bit by bit the particles of water part with their heat, and are placed in order by the winning power of cohesion. Presently a second beam shoots out from one side of the first, always with the same angle; and then a third, branch after branch. Other beams have been laid from other sides of the bowl; the growing lines meet, join and strengthen each other. Pour out the remaining water, and the bowl is full of interlacing rods of ice, delicate as needles, and crossing apparently in every direction. Different sets springing from different sides of the round bowl, meet at angles which differ from those described; but the several spikes of one set conform always to the law.

Leave the water in, and soon all the particles will have joined the solidifying mass, and the whole is frozen tightly together. If, now, we take a solid block of ice with two parrallel faces; such as are formed on the surface of still water, and pass a beam of strong sunlight through the block at right angles to these parrallel faces, presently we see a wonderful and beautiful change. The rays of heat in the sunshine are caught by the ice, and at once begin to pull down the work done by the cohesive force, when the heat was before withdrawn. The shadow of the piece of ice, after passing through a lens, may fall upon a screen, and many persons may see the result at once. First, round spots appear; then about these dots, in six directions, branches begin to shoot forth, as the particles are melted down and fall away from the mass, one after another, rereversing the order in which they were builded together.

We have shown some of the wonders of form which grow necessarily out of the chemical structure of a particle of water. There are wonders of force which are as notatable, but the limits of this article forbid us to enter upon their description or explanation.—S. H. Peabody, M. A.

WHERE IS YOUR LANTERN?

Young Harry was sent on on errand one evening in early winter. After giving him his message, his mother said: "Be sure you take your lantern with you, Harry.'

"Not I!" answered the boy, gruffly and disrespectfully; and he started, muttering to himself, "What do I want with a lantern? I am sure I know the way well enough."

Very soon Master Harry, in crossing the street, stumbled into a hole which had been made by recent rain. By this fall he knocked the flesh from his shin-bone, and covered his clothing with mud. On his way back he forgot the fence running along at the edge of the ravine. As he groped his way along the bank he fell over the side and went sprawling to the bottom of the ravine. With much ado, and after many bruises, he got into the road once more; but when he finally reached his mother's door, he looked more like a scare-crow than a living boy.

The lantern would have saved him all this. Was he not a foolish fellow not to take it? But what shall be said of those boys and girls who know the Bible to be the only lamp which can guide their feet safely through the paths of life to their home in heaven, and yet refuse to carry it? Are they not still more foolish? Are they not likely to suffer even more than the boy? You know they are.—Selected.

TEMPERANCE.

BEER DRINKING.

THE EXTENT TO WHICH IT PREVAILS AMONG THE POOR.

The remarkable consumption of beer in Chicago by the poorer classes has of late been noticed by a clergyman, who stated that over one-third of the beer manufactured in this city was consumed by the residents of tenement houses, flats, and cheap hotels. The drinking of beer is rapidly increasing, and the winter weather has not materially lessened the demand. It has always been the custom among the laboring classes to have a quart of beer to wash down the mid-day meal. Now it is customary to have beer for breakfast and supper.

A reporter yesterday visited a saloon contiguous to a tenement house in which eighteen families live, for the purpose of witnessing the consumption of beer by the can. The visit was made at the request of a clergyman, and the sale was found to be large. The reporter was not on hand at the time stated, but it was found that by 10 o'clock in the morning forty-two quarts of beer had been disposed of to the residents of the tenement. Gradually the demand increased during the morning hours, so that by noon the bartender had disposed of his first half-barrel. Little girls, 4, 5 and 6 years old, were the ones that got the beer for their parents. In many cases the little ones were badly clad, and more than once was seen the little toe peeping from a hole in a shoe. The day was cold; the little girls entered the saloon with their teeth chattering. Their hands were blue from cold, and on their heads were little shawls. In the saloon were a number of people playing pool. They jibed the little one for "shooting the can"; the bartender took his money, the little girl the beer, and the men resumed playing pool.

At 4 o'clock in the afternoon the amount of beer sold to the inmates of the tenement was one barrel. The reporter followed the next little girl to find out the state of affairs in the tenemeut. The stairs leading to the place were covered with snow and ice, and frequently a dilapidated pan of ashes was found. Persons of all uationalities inhabited the place. One door was opened by the reporter, who asked if Mr. Smith resided there. He did not. The inmates were a woman and three children. The place was cold and dreary looking. The water hydrant had frozen, and the woman was endeavoring to thaw it out by means of a candle. On the table was a half-glassful of beer, and near it was a part of a loaf of bread.

Another room was visited, aud there were found three women driuking beer and talking about their neighbors. The contents of the can were not sufficient to soothe the thirst of the women, so the crowd chipped in a nickel apiece, and three quarts more were purchased. A general tour of the place was subsequently made, and in every room but one was beer.

The bartender was asked if he was not afraid of being punished for selling beer to children. He said that he gave it to them at the request of their parents, and, as he knew all the children he was aware that it was not for themselves, but for their parents.

Much of the beer sold to the poor is of the worst quality. It is virtually swill, aud costs but $3.50 and $4 per barrel. The best beer costs $9 per barrel.—Chicago Tribune.

—The United States now ranks third in the list of beer-producing countries in the world. Although her breweries are few in number compared with those of other countries, yet she makes two-thirds as much beer as England whose breweries are almost ten times as many. England is at the head of all beer-producing countries, with 27,000 breweries and a product of 990,000,000 gallons annually; while Germany, with 25,000 breweries, makes 900,000,000 gallons yearly. The United States with only 3,000 breweries, makes about 600,000,000 gallons per annum. Then comes France, with 3,000 breweries and a production of 157,500,000 gallons, and Austria and Hungary, with 2,093 breweries, but a production of 280,000,000 gallons. Belgium has 1,250 breweries, which produced last year 210,240,000 gallons; Holland, 500 breweries, producing, 34,000,000, gallons; Russia, 480 breweries, producing 8,000,000 gallons; Switzerland, 423 breweries, producing 13,500,000 gallons; Denmark, 250 breweries, producing 21,000,000 gallons; Sweden, 220 breweries, producing 21,000,000 gallons, and Italy, 150 breweries, producing only 4,000,000 gallons. Nearly 80,000 persons are engaged in brewing lager beer in the United States.

THE CHURCHES.

—A month's work in Nebraska, that extended into five counties, and that was everywhere appreciated and encouraged, is reported by a missionary of the American Sunday-school Union. In one of his schools, in a class of ten taught by a lady, seven have been led to trust Christ, and join the church.

—The Sunday night services in the Central church, Denver, Col., on a recent occasion, consisted partly of a question box, the pastor answering queries. To the question as to whether unfermented wine at communion had Bible sanction, Rev. Dr. Hayes' instant, unqualified reply was that no other was sanctioned by Bible command or usage. In a few trenchant remarks he gave unanswerable reasons for this position.

—A glorious revival is in progress at the Bethesda Mission of the Central W. C. T. U., of Chicago. Between thirty and forty conversions have occurred within the last few days. This mission is a faithful minister to both body and soul. The forenoons of each day in the week, except Saturday, are occupied by a free kindergarten where fifty outcast children learn of order, beauty, law, temperance, and Christ, from the wisest and kindest of trained kindergartners. The afternoons are given up to medical mission work. The poor are treated and furnished medicine without cost. Physicians are in attendance and every infirmity is faithfully cared for. Every evening a Gospel meeting is carried on by the directors of the mission and earnest coadjutors, both men and women, and souls are being saved nightly. A day nursery for the children of working mothers occupies the upper story of the house, and is proving a material help to the poor wives of drunken husbands who could not otherwise provide for their families left destitute by drink.—Union Signal, Feb. 5.

—A series of meetings are being held by the United Presbyterian church of College Springs, Iowa, Rev. Dr. Wm. Johnson, pastor, this week, to close with a communion service next Sabbath.

—An interesting missionary meeting was held in the Y. M. C. A. parlors, Chicago, last Sabbath, in connection with the third annual Medical Students' Missionary Conference. Rev. Wesley M. Stover, one of the missionaries driven away last year from Bailunda, Western Africa, by the natives, at the instigation of the Portuguese, was the principal speaker.

—Rev. Mr. Ross, of North China, after much trouble, has been successful in discovering the written character, as well as the rudiments, of the Corean language. Two of the Gospels have been translated, and six thousand copies distributed through the country. A Chinese New Testament has found its way to the Court.

—The Moravians recently lost an energetic missionary in the death of Greenland Workman Brodbeck, who was lost with the vessel taking him back to his post of duty. This is the first accident of the kind that has happened in the extensive missionary enterprises of the Moravians in the thirty-six years of their existence.

—The Baptists of England are thoroughly in earnest about missions. It has been resolved to start ten stations, 100 miles apart, above Stanley Pool, and to send out twenty more missionaries to man them. To meet the large outlay involved, some of the friends of the Society are increasing their subscriptions. Thus, Mr. E. S. Robinson, of Bristol, promises £500 and his son $100 a year for five years.

—The speakers at the Free Church Mission, held lately in Glasgow, united in ascribing the success achieved in India to the fact that the example of the Scottish churches had been copied in using education as the principal instrument. In Africa the medical missionary enterprise has been the grand motive power; and Dr. Laws avowed his conviction that this must also be "the pioneer of all true and successful commerce."

—The only Italian Protestant primary school in Rome—that belonging to the Free Church of Italy—is being regularly besieged by the clericals. A circle of seven Romish schools has been formed around it. And not only is the instruction free, but the school-books are furnished gratis, and soup and bread as well as meat and potatoes are given to the pupils. For their benefit also, and that of their parents, economical kitchens have been set up. And yet the Protestant school holds on its way. It is not only doing good in behalf of pure Gospel truth, but also compelling its adversaries to do what they never intended.

—Twenty-eight persons were received into the Central Presbyterian church, Denver, (Dr. Hays, pastor), on December 21, of whom three were Chinamen. Seventeen Chinamen have been received into this church during the present pastorate.

—Elder Isaac Hyatt, of East Gaines, reports a series of meetings held by his church in the midst of the late very unfavorable weather. A number of conversions have resulted and the brethren have been greatly encouraged in the Lord.

—The Mission Field reports that Hon. John Campbell has given $50,000 towards establishing a missionary bishopric in Fiji, where he has large estates. And an intelligent Brazillian has recently made the gift of $5,000 towards erecting a Boy's Training School at Sao Paulo, under the care of the Presbyterians. Such gifts show what value the residents in heathen countries, or those who have large commercial interests there, place upon mission work.

—The assertion that no Moslem in India ever accepts Christianity should be buried. A Moulvie of considerable influence in Calcutta has recently renounced Mohammedanism, and accepted the Gospel. He shows great intelligence in regard to Christian doctrines, and has placed himself under instruction for future usefulness. He has been a champion Islam against Christian teachers. Another Moulvie, in Northern India, who has adopted Christianity, has been abandoned by his Mohammedan wife, and is, of course, subjected to much persecution by his former co-religionists.

MOODY IN RICHMOND.

Mr. Moody made a striking point on nepotism in his sermon on Daniel, and if there was a Bourbon in his hearing who did not feel that the shot was aimed directly at his head, then with him "ignorance is bliss." He said Daniel was honest and would not lie or steal, was a very radical and progressive statesman, and would not tolerate thieves and drones in the councils and offices of the empire. By thus acting he excited the envy and hatred of about one hundred and twenty princes, or "best people;" would not push their sons and nephews in office, or allow them to do so.

He was for honest government, for the many as against the few, and would tolerate no jobs. For this reason they resolved to get rid of him and destroy his influence. They could prefer no substantial charges against his official life or his private character, so they trumped up the so-called charge and fortified it in part by perjury, that he would not surrender his honest convictions in obedience to what he conceived to be an illegal and unnatural statute secured by fraudulent misrepresentations; and for a season their villainy triumphed. But the end came with dire disaster to them, and the reward was the people's, who had stood by Daniel. And the speaker doubted not that during the next four years there would be found a great many princes, and if so, he also hoped there would be found a Daniel.—Correspondence Inter Ocean.

FATHER CHINIQUY.

The account of the conversion of this well known ex-priest, whose labors for Protestantism are almost historical, are given below from a Times report of his first discourse in Chicago in connection with the French Mission:

He was ordained a priest of the Roman Catholic church in 1833, fifty-two years ago. He was then twenty-five years of age. He believed he was in the church or God. He studied the Scriptures and the holy fathers with a zeal and attention which only one who gave his whole time and soul to it could study them. He had a burning ambition to become the greatest man in the Roman church.

But in the long, quiet nights there occasionally crept into his burning thoughts soft whispers. They told him that in the Roman church they did not follow the words of God but the lying traditions of men. These whispers increased in number daily. They asked him why he invited the poor, miserable people to invoke the aid of Mary, since there was only one intercessionist, and that was Jesus himself. With supplicating voice he asked God to strengthen his faith; he wanted to live and die in the apostolic, holy Catholic church. For answer there came to him the words, "Come out!" "Come out!"

He was then living in Canada and enjoyed a great name. God had chosen him as a temperance lecturer. He had studied all the delicate intricacies of the human system and was engaged in stamping out the greatest enemy of God and man—alcoholism. During this period of doubt the Catholic bishop of Chicago came to him and said the church was engaged in a great and secret work—that of conquering the people of the United States for the pope of Rome. He asked Father Chiniquy, since his influence among the French was undisputed, to go into Illinois, then a wilderness, establish a mission, and induce the immigration of the French from France, Belgium, and Canada. Though the voice of doubt still whispered in his ear, the victory was not yet won by God, and Father Chiniquy undertook the task. He settled in what afterward became Kankakee, built missions, convents, and monasteries, and brought into the west seventy-five thousand French people.

The bishop of Chicago committed an act which the French people could not stand, and protested against. After a bitter fight against him, Father Chiniquy succeeded, through the pope and the emperor of France, in having the bishop removed. A new bishop was appointed in his stead. He required an act of submission. This Father Chiniquy gave him. It, however, did not suit the bishop, for in the act the priest had said that he submitted to the Roman Catholic church according to the law and word of God as found in the Scriptures. The bishop insisted that it must be a submission without conditions. To this M. Chiniquy would not accede. The bishop would not argue the matter, and not until he had sought the seclusion of his room did the priest realize the terrible significance of the words of the bishop: "You are no longer a priest of the holy Catholic church." Then M. Chiniquy discovered that it was not an act of submission, but of adoration, which the bishop endeavored to extract. He had not learned the awful lesson from Protestants or other enemies of the church, but from the church herself. It was, indeed, a confirmation of the whisper: "It is not a religion based upon the words of Christ, but upon the lying traditons of men."

Father Chiniquy said that after the trance in which he found salvation had expended itself, he was confronted by the awful terror of his situation. He had renounced the Catholic church, his only friend. To the Protestants he could not turn, for had he not as a Catholic, denounced and made bitter enemies of them? He knew the power of the pope of Rome. He knew that as a rebel, a heretic, he had entered into a war to the death. Not only would he be pursued in the pulpit and the press but in the confessional, that most terrible of the Roman Catholic engines. If necessary, they would fix upon him the blackest crimes, the most horrible infamies. The consciousness of right, however, the powerful belief that God had opened the way to him and was with him, inspired him.

"Twenty-two times," said M. Chiniquy, "have they tried to kill me—seven times in Montreal and once in Quebec. The tramping of a vast horde outside the church in which I was preaching, the thrilling cries, 'Kill him!' 'Kill him!' a shower of stone which sent the glass in the windows rattling to the ground, and a fleeing congregation—these impressions were dimmed for the moment by the stones which descended upon my poor body. Blood flowed from my ears and my mouth and I fell, struck by a hundred missils. Twice also have the bullets of assissins whizzed past my ears, but I bear a charmed life, and the mystery of its continuance I cannot comprehend."

OBITUARY.

ROBERT S. REED died at his home in Huntsville, O., on the 31st day of December, 1884, in the 64th year of his age. Brother Reed was a sincere Christian, and a true friend of anti-secrecy and National Reform. He manifested his interest in these and other good objects, by exerting his personal influence and contributing liberally of his means for their promotion. W. W. S.

IN BRIEF.

There are now 718 miles of underground telegraph wires in Chicago—more than in any other city in the country.

The progress of the Japanese in civilization is probably the most rapid ever known in the history of the world The authorities there have just published a summary of educational works for 1882, showing there were then in the country 28,908 elementary schools, 76,769 teachers, and 2,616,879 scholars. In 1880, 37,683,633 papers were sold.

An augur that will bore a square hole is a recent invention of a Cleveland man. Its end instead of having a screw or bit, has a cam motion which oscillates a cutter mounted on a steel rocking knife which cuts on both sides. In order to prevent the splitting of the wood, the ends of the cutter are provided with small semi-circular-shaped saws, which help in cutting out perfectly square corners.

About 1,000,000 claims for pensions have been filed since 1861. More than half the number, according to the forthcoming report of the Commissioner, 545,130 claims in all, have been allowed. The whole amount disbursed for pensions since 1861 is $678,346,507. The amount paid during the past year was $56,907,507, including the sum paid to new claimants during the past year, 31,307 were paid, but as a large number of persons were dropped from the rolls, the net increase in the number on the pension rolls, was only 19,078. The whole number of pensioners is 322,756, of whom about two-thirds are army invalids, the remainder widows, children and relatives, and navy invalids, with a few survivors of the war of 1812 and their widows.

The record of violent deaths and serious bodily injuries suffered by those engaged in mining, is very much smaller this year than last, because there have been this year no such sweeping disasters as that of Braidwood, where sixty-nine were drowned in one mine, and that at Coulterville, where ten men were killed by an explosion. Omitting the mortality in these cases, as exceptional, and refcrring only to what may be termed the average death rate from ordinary causes we have for the year 1882, forty killed, or one for every 227,891 tons of coal mined; for 1883, fifty-five killed, or one for every 192,887 tons of coal; and for 1884, forty-six killed, or one for every 219,587 tons of coal. For the three years this gives us an average of one death for every 210,109 tons of product.

A grand cathedral has been built in Moscow to commemorate the retreat of Napolean from Russia. Immediately on the withdrawal of the French, Alexander I. decreed the erection of a memorial temple. Foundations were laid, and nearly two million dollars were expended or wasted; and then by the Emperor Nicholas a new site was chosen, and work was begun on the present building. The site cost, with embankment, terrace, etc., the sum of $900,000. The foundations were laid in 1838, and the walls were completed twenty years after. A quarter of a century more has been expended in fittings and decorations. The largest bell weighs twenty-six tons. The cost of the whole peal was upward of $65,000. The five copper cupolas cost $850,000. The doors cost $300,000. The interior is very gorgeous. The two rows of candelabra around the cupola cost $200,000, and the total number of candles to be lighted throughout the building is upward of 3,000. At the top of the cupola is a painting representing the collossal proportions of the first person of the Trinity as an old man, with the infant Jesus, The height of the figure is forty-nine feet, the length of the face seven feet and the height of the infant twenty-one feet. Also below the cupola are a number of figures of apostles and fathers, each twenty-one feet high. The edifice will accommodate 10,000 worshipers, and its total cost was over eleven million dollars.

WEBSTER'S PRACTICAL A NEW DEPARTURE IN DICTIONARIES.

An Industrial Revolution.—In a large Connecticut manufacturing establishment there is in operation a new style of furnace which produces more steam-power from a consumption of 1,000 lbs of coal than can be generated from 20,000 lbs burned in the ordinary way. In other words, the new contrivance already saves nineteen-twentieths of the fuel, and it is believed that before being publicly announced it will be so improved that the saving will reach 49 fiftieths! The facts already developed are simply incredible to one who has not actually seen them verified.

A Remarkable Coincidence.—While the new Furnac was in process of construction, the editors and publishers of Webster's Unabridged were engaged upon their new work which is as great an improvement upon all previous Dictionary productions, and just as valuable in its way as is the incredible fuel economizer above alluded to. Webster's Practical is not only a new compilation by the leading Dictionary House of the world, but it embodies several new features which, for ordinary use, render it pre-eminent among dictionaries—not excepting even the Unabridged.

1st, Condensation—By grouping all derivative and compound words under their root or leader (as in the "Book" example quoted below), such words are adequately treated in one-third of the space required by the old arrangement. By this means nearly all the desirable material of the four and five-dollar dictionaries is presented in a convenient and handy form in Webster's Practical.

2d, Association.—We comprehend as well as remember things chiefly by their associations. For this reason any one who shall carefully read the "Book" paragraph which we reproduce from Webster's Practical Dictionary, will not only comprehend it more readily, but will be able to remember two or three times as much as would be gained by reading about the same words when treated separately as in other works.

3d, Ready Reference.—Not only do we comprehend and remember more readily by the new grouping method, but we do it in less than a fourth of the time required when the words are classified in the old way. Hence, no one who values time would hesitate to pay one dollar for Webster's Practical rather than accept the best of the older dictionaries as a gift.

4th, Derivative Terminations.—Only the larger dictionaries hitherto published give the derivative terminations. The New American Dictionary, for instance, does not give any of the four variations of so common a word as forhear, while they are all given in Webster's Practical.

5th, The Illustrations in Webster's Practical are more numerous and better executed than those of any other abridged or low-priced dictionary.

6th, Prefixes and Suffixes.—Another important feature of Webster's Practical is its peculiar treatment of prefixes and suffixes, which is believed to be more desirable than a separate department of two or three hundred pages which is sometimes allotted to them.

7th, Compendium Matter.—Still another invaluable feature of Webster's Practical is its compendium matter, over one hundred pages of which is devoted to the most complete Pronouncing Vocabulary ever compiled of Biblical, Classical, Mythological, Historical and Geographical Proper names. With Webster's Practical Dictionary at hand, one need not be at a loss to correctly pronounce or spell the most difficult words.

8th, An Invaluable Book.—The importance of supplying every child with Webster's Practical for his very own, is not generally appreciated. As an educator it is worth a hundred times its price, and a little self-denial to provide one or more copies in every family will prove a better economy than an endowment of hoarded bank-stocks later on in life.

The following paragraph is reproduced from Webster's Practical.

Book, bŏŏk, n. A collection of sheets of paper, etc., bound together; a literary composition, written or printed; a subdivision of a literary work. (Mer.) A volume in which accounts are kept. — v. t. (BOOKED (bŏŏkt), BOOKING.) Webster's Practical Dictionary, ($1) 600,000 Words and 1,400 Illustrations.
New American Dictionary, ($1) 240,000, Words and 116 Illustrations.

Quality Test.—Aside from all advantages above alluded to, there is still another and very important feature of the new work to be considered, viz.: its quality as compared with the cheap dictionaries which have had the largest sales, and which have been compiled chiefly from the old editions of Webster on which the copyrights have expired. Hence Webster's Practical contains more matter than any other dollar dictionary. Its quality, to say the least, is the very best, while its arrangement and all other new and desirable features, including first-class illustrations, paper, printing and binding are added without extra charge.

A Subscription Book.—As Webster's Practical is not for sale at book-stores, our readers will be able to procure it only from canvassing agents, unless it be ordered in connection with this journal in accordance with our special offers.

"A WEEKLY SHOWER OF REFRESHING."

Such is the language of a minister in writing of the

OF
New York.

—)o–o(—

Read some of the many high opinions of the CHRISTIAN NATION expressed by people and papers:

The True Radical Ring.

I like your paper. It has the true radical ring, and is growing better every week.
(REV.) T. C. SPROULL.

A Weekly Treat.

I have enjoyed a weekly treat, as the CHRISTIAN NATION is just to my taste. I like the fearless stand that it has taken for Prohibition. H. M. POLLOCK.

Par Excellence.

Allow me to congratulate you on the appearance and make-up of your paper. The matter is very good, and in fact the whole is par excellence. I hope you may receive many thousands of subscribers. S. O. LOWRY.

In the Front Rank.

I congratulate you most heartily upon the success which has thus far attended your enterprise, and wish you the largest measure of success in the future. This undoubtedly you will have, and simply because of the merits of your paper, which already holds its place among our best religious Journals, and has put itself abreast of the advanced movements in journalism. (REV.) J. F. CARSON.

Hold the Fort for Prohibition.

I am very much pleased with your paper. It is not a yearling, but I hope that it may be, like England's queen of old, hale and hearty at sixty—that it may live to see this nation a Christian Nation indeed and in truth. Hold the fort for Prohibition! Some of us have had to pass through the fire of persecution because we dared to vote our sentiments on that question, and your paper has been a weekly shower of refreshing to us. May it prove a blessing in this, and be a great power in the work of overturning the greatest evil that ever cursed our nation, and which does more than any other agent in hindering us from becoming a Christian Nation. (REV.) A. H. ORR.

Able Corps of Writers and Contributors.

FARM NOTES.

POINTS IN POULTRY KEEPING.

The "Plymouth Rocks," being the best feathered of all varieties of chickens, are apt to be the best winter layers, and as they feather up very young, are better suited to the incubator trade, or the artificial rearing of broilers than the "Light Brahmas," or many other varieties. There ought to be a profit in buying up young roosters, caponizing them, fattening them and selling at the usual market price. Turkeys treated in this way often reach a weight of from thirty to fifty pounds. A brood of chickens led by a turkey hen to forage in the fields, will attain to great weight and early maturity without food or care on the part of the owner. The best eggs are the result of a meat diet; the high colored and well flavored eggs of Kansas during the grasshopper visitation, were a marvel to strangers. When grasshoppers and worms fail, their lack should be supplied by feeding cracklings and other cheap butcher's offal. The crushed oyster shell supply, and the boxes of road dust or ashes, should be kept within easy reach. When moving to an entirely new location we secure immunity from gapes for two years. The farmer who does not provide his wife with a good poultry house is standing in his own light, as it need not be fine or costly. In winter, drop a little carbolic acid in the food mixture, once a month, as a preventive of disease, and give a few appetizers, such as cabbage, garlic, and red pepper, with a variety of grain food and not all corn. With this treatment and a proper house, we may count more certainly on profitable returns than when the fowls have to roost on icy perches, exposed to the zero winds of long winter nights. The products of the poultry yard are always in demand, and judging by the imports now made in that line, they will be the last to glut the market in our large cities.—American Agriculturist.

BE PREPARED.

Have all your seeds in readiness months before wishing to sow them. There are commercial seedsmen who have large farms, and every facility for growing seeds of all kinds, for keeping them pure, and for testing their vitality before they are put upon the market. They not only advertise these seeds largely in the agricultural papers, but they know that they have them. If a man buys these seeds, and gives them fair treatment, they will come up, and bear fruit after their kind. If there is a failure, the cultivator will know that the trouble is not in the seed grower, but in the seed sower, or in the soil. There will be no chance to ease conscience by blaming the seed grower. It is a happy day when a man recognizes his own lousy chickens, as they come home to roost. It is a good plan to clear out all the old seeds, of uncertain date from the seed basket, or bag, and start early in the season with a new and genuine stock. We raise some seeds with a pedigree, having followed their history for years. Others come from plants that have given maximum crops for one or two years. Every year we get seeds and plants from commercial seedsmen, who have a reputation to lose. It is money well invested. Try it and see.—American Agriculturist.

A THRILLING EXPERIENCE!

REMARKABLE STATEMENT OF PERSONAL DANGER AND PROVIDENTIAL ESCAPE.

The following story which is attracting wide attention from the press, is so remarkable that we cannot excuse ourselves if we do not lay it before our readers, even though its length would ordinarily preclude its admission to our limited space.

To the Editor Rochester, N. Y., Democrat:

SIR:—On the first day of June, 1881, I lay at my residence in this city surrounded by my friends and waiting for death. Heaven only knows the agony I then endured, for words can never describe it. and yet if a few years previous any one had told me I was to be brought so low, and by so terrible a disease, I should have scoffed at the idea. I had always been uncommonly strong and healthy, and weighed over 200 pounds and hardly knew, in my own experience, what pain or sickness was. Very many people who will read this statement realize at times that they are unusually tired, and cannot account for it. They feel dull pains in various parts of the body and do not understand it. Or they are exceedingly hungry one day and entirely without appetite the next. This was just the way I felt when the relentless malady which had fastened itself upon me first began. Still I thought nothing of it; that probably I had taken a cold which would soon pass away. Shortly after this I noticed a heavy and at times neuralgic, pain in one side of my head, but as it would come one day and be gone the next, I paid little attention to it. Then my stomach would get out of order and my food often failed to digest, causing at times great inconvenience. Yet, even as a physician, I did not think that these things meant anything serious. I fancied I was suffering from malaria and doctored myself accordingly. But I got no better. I next noticed a peculiar color and odor about the fluids I was passing—also that there were large quantities one day and very little the next, and that a persistent froth and scum appeared upon the surface, and a sediment settled. And yet I did not realize my danger, for, indeed, sceing these symptoms continually, I finally became accustomed to them, and my suspicion was wholly disarmed by the fact that I had no pain in the affected organs or in their vicinity. Why I should have been so blind I cannot understand.

I consulted the best medical skill in the land. I visited all the famed mineral springs in America and traveled from Main to California. Still I grew worse. No two physicians agreed as to my malady. One said I was troubled with spinal irritation; another, dyspepsia; another, heart disease; another, general debility; another, congestion of the base of the brain; and so on through a long list of common diseases, the symptoms of many of which I really had. In this way several years passed, during which time I was steadily growing worse. My condition had really become pitiable. The slight symptoms I at first experienced were developed into terrible and constant disorders. My weight had been reduced from 207 to 130 pounds. My life was a burden to myself and friends. I could retain no food on my stomach, and lived wholly by injections. I was a living mass of pain. My pulse was uncontrollable. In my agony I frequently fell to the floor and clutched the carpet, and prayed for death. Morphine had little or no effect in deadening the pain. For six days and nights I had the death-premonitory hiccoughs constantly. My water was filled with tube-casts and albumen. I was struggling with Bright's Disease of the kidneys in its last stages!

While suffering thus I received a call from my pastor, the Rev. Dr. Foote, at that time rector of St. Paul's Episcopal Church, of this city. I felt that it was our last interview, but in the course of conversation Dr. Foote detailed to me the many remarkable cures of cases like my own which had come under his observation, by means of a remedy, which he urged me to try. As a practicing physician and a graduate of the schools, I derided the idea of any medicine outside the regular channels being in the least beneficial. So solicitous, however, was Dr. Foote, that I finally promised I would waive my prejudice. I began its use on the first day of June, 1881, and took it according to directions. At first it sickened me; but this I thought was a good sign for one in my debilitated condition. I continued to take it; the sickening departed and I was finally able to retain food upon my stomach. In a few days I noticed a decided change for the better, as also did my wife and friends. My hiccoughs ceased and I experienced less pain than formerly. I was so rejoiced at this improved condition that, upon what I had believed but a few days before was my dying bed, I vowed in the presence of my family and friends, should I recover I would both publicly and privately make known this remedy for the good of humanity, wherever and whenever I had opportunity, and this letter is in fulfillment of that vow. My improvement was constant from that time, and in less than three months I had gained 26 pounds in flesh, became entirely free from pain and I believe I owe my life and present condition wholly to Warner's Safe Cure, the remedy which I used.

Since my recovery I have thoroughly reinvestigated the subject of kidney difficulties and Bright's disease, and the truths developed are astounding. I, therefore, state deliberately, and as a physician, that I believe more than one-half the deaths which occur in America are caused by Bright's disease of the kidneys This may sound like a rash statement, but I am prepared to fully verify it. Bright's disease has no distinctive symptoms of its own (indeed, it often develops without any pain whatever in the kidneys or their vicinity), but has the symptoms of nearly every other common complaint. Hundreds of people die daily, whose burials are authorized by a physician's certificate as occurring from "heart disease," "apoplexy," "paralysis," "spinal complaint," "rheumatism," "pneumonia," and other common complaints, when in reality it is from Bright's disease of the kidneys. Few physicians, and fewer people, realize the extent of this disease or its dangerous and insidious nature. It steals into the system like a thief, manifests its presence if at all by the commonest symptoms and fastens itself upon the constitution before the victim is aware of it. It is nearly as hereditary as consumption, quite as common and fully as fatal. Entire families, inheriting it from their ancestors, have died, and yet none of the number knew or realized the mysterious power which was removing them. Instead of common symptoms it often shows none whatever, but brings death suddenly, from convulsions, apoplexy or heart disease. As one who has suffered, and knows by bitter experience what he says, I implore every one who reads these words not to neglect the slightest symptoms of kidney difficulty. Certain agony and probable death will be the sure result of such neglect and no one can afford to hazard such chances

I am aware that such an unqualified statement as this, coming from me, known as I am throughout the entire land as a practitioner and lecturer, will arouse the surprise and possible animosity of the medical profession and astonish all with whom I am acquainted, but I make the foregoing statements based upon facts which I am prepared to produce and truths which I can substantiate to the letter. The welfare of those who may possibly be sufferers such as I was, is an ample inducement for me to take the step I have, and if I can successfully warn others from the dangerous path in which I once walked, I am willing to endure all professional and personal consequence.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

WASHINGTON.

The House Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the various resolutions relative to the recent dynamite explosions in London, has decided to report it unbecoming the dignity of the House of Representatives to assume American citizens had been in any way connected with the crime where no charges had been made; and that the committee was unwilling to request any officer of the government to search for proof of guilt where there was no charge.

The House passed the postoffice appropriation bill. The steamship subsidy clause was defeated. William Howard Mills, of the Treasury Department, preferred charges of mal-administration, violation of civil-service rules, and misappropriation of public property, against the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

COUNTRY.

Last Thursday as a gang of nine men were cleaning a sewer in this city they were overcome by sewer gas and five were dead before they could be rescued.

Southern papers report snow storms in Montgomery, Talladega, and Tuscaloosa, Ala. At Columbus, Duck Hill, and Macon, Miss., there has been a fall of nine inches, the heaviest snowstorms ever known in those places. The snow at Vicksburg delayed railroad trains, and a fog on the river checked the movement of boats. Snow also fell at Shreveport, Louisiana.

Fire broke out in the insane department of the Blockley Almshouse, at West Philadelphia, Pa., Thursday evening, and there being no fire escape in the section, the inmates were penned in the blazing pile. Seven were taken out dead, six were found mortally burned, and six others are missing, supposed to have perished.

Near Onkone, W. Va., a Miss Cox who died suddenly, was rather hastily buried. Dogs raised a disturbance at the grave during the night, and it was re-opened next day, when it was discovered that the woman had revived, and in her struggle in the coffin had lacerated her body in a terrible manner, and died of suffocation.

A bill to prevent children from acquiring the habit of using tobacco was introduced Wednesday in the Michigan Legislature.

Heavy snow-storms are reported in sections of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. Trains have been impeded by the snow.

During January the beef and pork products exported were valued at $11,965,948, against $9,091,877 in January, 1884.

Long Island Sound is studded with masses of ice, making navigation dangerous, and will be frozen solid if the cold continues. The tides have created icebergs ten to fifteen feet high.

O. M. Dudgeon, near Hammondsville, Ky., cut his throat Tuesday night through grief at the demise of his child and his wife being at the point of death. The three bodies were interred in one coffin.

The closing of the mills at Manayunk, Pa., has caused great destitution among the 10,000 persons thrown out of employment.

An explosion occurred in the Vale colliery, New Glasgow, N. S., Tuesday night, thirteen men being killed or suffocated and many wounded.

John Murphy, whose brother was lynched by vigilantes near Helena, Mont., was found on the coupling of a train which reached Dubuque Thursday night, and said he had ridden from Montana in front of baggage cars. He is so badly frozen that he cannot recover.

Claiming to have been so instructed in a vision, George Gassar, of Youngstown, Ohio, has made desperate efforts to kill his 14 year-old son, and has been arrested. He belongs to a sect called "The Followers of Christ."

Fifty fat hogs valued at $600 were found frozen to death Thursday on the Carson farm near Lexington, Ill.

Reports from Iowa, Wisconsin, Michigan, Indiana, and Illinois, show that the the snow storm which began Sunday evening Feb. 8th was the heaviest for years. Railroads were blockaded and business stagnant all over the section visited. At points in Illinois and Indiana the storm was ushered in by lightning and thunder, a barn being struck, a horse killed, and two boys stunned at Franklin, Ill. At other places vivid lightning was seen, unaccompanied by thunder. The storm was followed by extremely cold weather for several day and another snow last Sunday.

The Kansas Legislature condemns the Kansas State Commissioner at the World's Fair for joining in the invitation to Jefferson Davis to welcome the liberty bell.

A bill, ordered engrossed Tuesday by the Indiana Senate, provides that the seller or buyer of votes, or those who use corrupt influences at elections, shall be disfranchised for life, and be ineligible for office, besides being punished by fine and imprisonment. The Democratic congressional reapportionment bill, which is nearly completed, gives Republicans but two districts in the State.

The Farmer's Congress held its session in New Orleans last week. A resolution was adopted urging on Congress the imperative necessity of the elevation of the Department of Agriculture into one of the chief executive departments of the government.

An appeal for medicines and linens, with which to dress wounds, was received at Denison, Texas, Monday, from Savannah, in the Indian Territory, where the recent mine explosion occurred. Thirty victims are suffering for proper treatment.

The Edgar Thompson Steel-works, at Braddocks, Pa., employing 4,000 men, resumed in all departments last week.

Three aged and demented women, who occupied a small wooden structure on the poor-house grounds near Monticello, Ill., were burned to death Monday night by the shanty taking fire.

A boiler exploded Tuesday at the Trenton mine, near Pottsville, Pa., fatally injuring two men. A portion of the boiler went through a house sixty yards away, severely wounding an infant in its cradle.

Jones Island, Milwaukee, was flooded Monday night, waves from the lake sweeping the district, and driving the people to places of safety. The cold was intense and the sufferings of the islanders excruciating.

Mrs. Hiram Atkins eloped from Norwich, Ohio, Monday night with Emanuel Porter, an employe. The residence was found blazing a little later, and in the ruins were found the remains of Mr. Atkins and his two children by a former wife. Current belief is that the fugitives set fire to the structure before their departure.

By an explosion in the Central Iron and Steel Works at Brazil, Indiana, Tuesday morning, seven men were killed and a number wounded, many of them dangerously. It is believed that other bodies were buried in the debris.

FOREIGN.

Surgeon-General Hamilton has information from Panama that 109 persons died in the canal hospital in November. The mortality on the Isthmus is concealed as much as possible, for if the fact were known abroad it would check the flow of laborers, contractors, tourists and others. People die daily of yellow and pernicious malarial fevers. In the new cemetery, opened at Panama in July last, there are already more than 1,000 graves. There are five cemeteries in the neighborhood. A correspondent says he has no doubt that 2,400 people were buried at Panama in 1884. The death rate at Colon and along the line has been very heavy.

Many members of the Liberal party in England are reported as in favor of handing the control of the Soudan over to the Sultan, as the best way out of the Egyptian troubles. Messengers who claim that they left Khartoum February 3, and arrived at Korti Saturday, reported that Gen. Gordon was still alive, and holding his position. Little confidence is, however, given the reports. At the council of war it was resolved to increase the Indian contingent for the reinforcement of Gen. Wolseley to 3,500 men, and thus raise the force of Gen. Graham for his Suakim expedition to 11,500 men.

At the approaching session of Parliament the government will demand a credit of £2,500,000 for the Suakim expedition. This will very likely provoke a conflict between the government and the opposition, and result, it is believed, in a dissolution of the present Parliament, a consummation which a majority of the Liberals, Conservatives and Parnellites desire.

SIXTEEN THOUSAND.

Since last report on the Washington Monument protest there have been received at this office 882 signatures, and Secretary Stoddard's figures from Washington show that 4,167 names were sent to the American office as we requested. Add to these numbers the lists sent direct to Senator Sherman, so far as reported to the Cynosure, and we have a grand total of 16,018.

When we remember the severe storm and cold, and the snow-blocked roads, and that most of the petitions were in circulation but one or two days, everyone will rejoice at the success, under God, of our united effort.

THE MORMON INITATION.

The Cynosure is now preparing a series of cuts to illustrate the secret initiatory ceremonies of the Mormon Endowment House at Salt Lake City, and we expect to publish in the issue of March 12th an exposition of these ceremonies from an authentic source. The lecture of Joseph Cook on the "Mormon Cancer" is giving a new impetus to this discussion; and the editorial in the present number of the Cynosure is commended to all who are interested in it.

Rodger Clawson, who was tried in Utah for the crime of polygamy, and convicted, and then sentenced by the court to pay a fine of eight hundred dollars, and to imprisonment for four years, carried his case to the Supreme Court of the United States; and that court has just rendered a judgment confirming that of the court below. This kind of medicine promptly given is the best remedy that we can think of for the cure of the malaria of polygamy.

The committee of the House of Representatives to which was referred a bill regulating the manufacture and sale of liquor in the Territories, has reported against the submission of the measure to the voters. The majority of the committee say the sale of intoxicants is already sufficiently guarded by law in the Territories, and when they become States they can do as they please. The laws referred to are those prohibiting the sale of liquor to Indians and soldiers, which no one knows better than these Congressmen, are not worth the paper they are written on. Liquor is practically free to every Indian or soldier who can buy it or steal it, and will be until the poison is kept out by laws against importation as well as manufacture and sale. No such prohibitory regulation can pass until it has a national party to back it.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union expects to hold, on the 14th and 15th of March, special meetings in its booths at the New Orleans Exposition. Mrs. Nichols, superintendent of the Union in charge of the booths, reports: "There are any number of artistic buildings upon the ground for the sale of beer. There is no provision made for a single pint of drinking water for the tens of thousands of people who already throng the place." To meet this exigency, the secretary of the National W. C. T. U. calls for immediate contributions from everybody to provide free icewater to the visiting public. The neglect of the Exposition management in this matter seems hardly less than criminal, and the readiness of the National Union to step into the gap, instead of merely sitting by and scolding, is an effectual answer to the sharp critics of that organization, who have been so diligent since the defeat of Blaine.

The New Orleans Exposition, although the largest one ever projected, has shown probably the least regard for the moral convictions of its patrons. The almost unlimited sale of liquor and the desecration of the Lord's Day have given reasonable offense to many, and the press already begins to notice how much the attendance is cut down for this reason. The National W. C. T. U. has through its officers sent the following remonstrance to the president and directors of the Exposition: "We have heard with unfeigned sorrow that the great 'Exposition' of God's blessings vouchsafed us as a people, has become the occasion of breaking his Sabbath law. That the chief Christian nation of the world, and especially the portion of that nation hitherto justly esteemed as the more scrupulous in hallowing the Lord's Day, should set such an example to infidel and heathen lands seems well nigh incredible, and we have anxiously but vainly awaited the contradiction of a statement so out of harmony with the genius of our civilization and the illustrious history of its beginning. Permit us, therefore, in the spirit of Christian patriotism and with profound earnestness, to appeal to you. By the heroic memories of our past history, by the sanctity of our American home life, which owes so much to the seventh day's peace, privacy and worship; by the guarantees and safeguards which come to workingmen and their families when the Sabbath is hallowed; and by the beneficent future assured to us as a Christian republic, if true to our high calling, we beg you to close the great Exposition under your care, upon the Sabbath day."

In his first two Monday lectures of this year's course in Tremont Temple, Boston, Joseph Cook assailed the threatening evils of Mormonism and the secret atheistic and communistic societies. In his lecture of last week he took up the subject of National and State prohibition with a moral courage which their churches may very well commend to the Congregational ministers of Chicago since their late gratuitous action on the same subject. Mr. Cook spoke of the laws requiring education in the public schools on the evils of intemperance in the States of Vermont, Michigan, New York and New Hampshire and proposed such a law for the State of Massachusetts. The audience sustained the proposition by a hearty and unanimous rising vote. The substance of the prelude is reported thus by the Golden Rule: "Whiskey has now become king. Is not a new party a necessity? There are three ways to overthrow this rum power; by law and order leagues, by non-partisan constitutional prohibition, as in Maine, Kansas, and Iowa, and by prohibition through a new political party. Both parties have deliberately given themselves over to this accursed Moloch. His reasons for a new party were because each political party now refuses to submit constitutional prohibition to the people, and when once passed will not enforce it. Our cities grow rapidly, are ruled by whiskey and dominate parties. The new party should steal its thunder from the entire political sky. A broad eclectic reform party would reform or supercede its rivals. The time is ripe for it. The Government of Canada is pledged to submit it as soon as the people demand it. English conservatives now demand it and even the Catholics of this country urge their followers to embrace 'a more becoming way of living.' Municipal misrule may yet imperil our liberties, and be only put down by soldiers and street barricades. The rum traffic dreads above all things a National Prohibition party, therefore I believe in it. This may be our opportunity."

FREEMASONRY MUST GO.

BY REV. H. A. DAY.

We may daily thank God and take courage. God will make even the wrath of men to praise him. Freemasonry must go. It is doomed. I may prove untrue to the cause of justice and truth; others may become discouraged and withdraw from the conflict; but all the while, the Omnipotent moves on to the carrying out of his sublime purposes. "Every tree that my Heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up," says Jesus, and it will be so. Men may slander, and blaspheme, but the truth will go marching on, cutting like a two-edged sword. The storm will beat on the foundation of sand, and ultimately there will be a fall, and great will be the fall. It matters nothing that men do not believe the revelation God hath given. It is almost amusing to hear men so often say "I know the Bible says so; but I don't believe it," as if the great God would alter all his arrangements, because a man's opinion did not harmonize with his revealed truth. It may possibly appear to the reformer that all men are turning away from the truth of God to take up with the fables of lodgery, but the whole fabric will ultimately fall to ruin, and the followers thereof be left desolate. Do not be deceived into the belief that all we read in the papers of great revivals is true. It means a great drel in these days of pride and show, to get even one, down to a humble following of the meek and lowly Jesus. Let not the minister fail, as the eye of the Almighty is upon him, in revival effort, to preach and pray against the lodge. Can a soul follow Jesus, taking up his cross daily, and be a participant, more or less, in the senseless, not to say, blasphemous, mockery and mummery of Freemasonry and Odd-fellowship?

Can a soul be a humble, holy, Christian, and at the same time be a participant in ceremonies which are only calculated to imitate and bring to mind the idolatry of the days of Ceres, Flora, and Pomona? No man in his right mind dare presume that God will let it pass under his scrutiny to-day with less favor than in past ages. Where are the ministers of God? The Wesleyan Methodist church is falling away from their first position on this important question. So with the United Brethren, and Free Methodist churches. The best talent and blood of this country is being sacrificed on the altars of secrecy to-day, and never-dying souls are exposed to the dangers of sinful associations, in this life, and in the oncoming day of God's great wrath, to the perils of eternal damnation, who would be safely and securely sheltered in the blessed fold of Jesus but for the cursed midnight orgies of these mumbling, muttering followers of Baal. Again I say, where are the preachers? Where are God's ministers? Perhaps they are praying and arguing over the question as to whether entire satisfaction is subsequent to justification, and whether it is a gradual or instantaneous work. Much time has been wasted by this senseless debate. While the inhabitants of Jerusalem divided themselves into factions and strove with one another, the enemy entered the gates, and the whole became an easy prey.

Oh, that we might stand with a solid front against this common enemy. Are you fearful about salary, etc.? To whom belongs the earth, and its riches? Who laid the corner stone thereof if thou knowest? Who hath stretched the line upon it? When thy God formed it by his creative power, the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy. Why may we not shout victory in the face of this foe? "The Lord of hosts is with us and the God of Jacob is our refuge." Says David, "He spreads a table before me in the presence of my enemies," and so he does for me, praise his name.

Yes, Freemasonry and all patterned after it, with its millions of votaries must go down. Shout it, reformers, until the eternal hills of God send back the echo. Cynosure and American, God speed! Reformers everywhere, God speed! A glorious company is forming, robed in white, with palms in their hands. They come up through great tribulations. Will we endure in the presence of secrecy with all its pomp, parade, and power, as seeing Him who is invisible, but to the eye of steadfast faith?

RIGHTS OF THE "CHILDREN OF THE KINGDOM."

BY ELDER NATHAN CALLENDER.

Much is said and much written on human rights: as individuals, as families, communities, States and nations. Human selfishness, nothing else, causes all the seeming collisions between God-given human rights. As subjects of the kingdom "never to be destroyed," the eternal government of the "King of Glory," we have inalienable rights never to be surrendered on any account. But true godliness has had to fight its own battles. Its own, I say, though God himself fights with and for his people. But every God-appointed prerogative of man is to be asserted and fought through by the moral agent himself. Even the chicken breaks from its own prison walls in course of natural development, and walks from his shell seeking room and making it, too. But for the persistent efforts of the infant to claim his rights, even the fond mother might keep him in his cradle to his ruin. But by dint of exertion and effort he asserts, and so takes, his God-appointed rights by force. But for the law of self-assertion, through the ages, godliness could not have lived in our world a score of years, nay, not a single month.

When a despot, like Nebuchadnezzar, decrees universal prostration to his golden image, or another like him, decrees that no petition or prayer shall be offered to any one but himself, for thirty days, then it is that godliness asserts his own heaven-born prerogatives and says, I will not, or, in the other case, I will, and goes to duty just as though nothing had happened. What grandeur in the words and acts of those captive Hebrews recorded in Daniel third and sixth. But for such men as these in church and state, this world would be but little better than that where all the hosts of the nether world, by their own moral gravity, do finally congregate—called "the bottomless pit." Godliness does live and thrive, defy, and fight his way through this unfriendly world, despite kings and despots, earth and hell united. As no earthly power can enforce godliness upon any soul, so no power of earth or hell can prevent a soul from walking with God.

Never in our experience have we felt more deeply the worth and the potency of a heaven-inspired soul, moving like a new-made sun in its moral orbit of light and love, clearing out of its path by attraction and assimilation or by destruction, every antagonist. When a sovereign soul, subject to the Sovereign of all, concludes to put its weight with right against wrong, with God against the arch destroyer, and vote purely on a moral and living issue, he will not be swayed from his duty by political demagogues and mere party men, though they scoff or rage. Storms on election days will not keep him home. A sublime purpose impels him forward. Since the day when human slavery was doomed by the free ballots of the reading masses of a thinking people, no such body of God and conscience-inspired men have used their sovereign right at the polls in behalf of God, humanity, and reform. From ten millions of voters in round numbers, God in his own way found a Gideon's army of 150,000 who believe in "lapping water" instead of whisky, and while the panic-stricken and shrewd liquor power concede that prohibition means business and doom to whisky, unless vanquished by its liquor-inspired hosts, the great parties seem amused at the smallness of Gideon's army. Let these scoffers at Gideon wait till he comes around again, four years hence. These years will give them time and opportunity to get out of danger by falling into line with those who vote, not for party, but for God-inspired principles.

The rights of the children of the kingdom are simply the rights of true godliness, and it is the right of a godly man to do his duty as a citizen as well as a saint. The liquor power may make some martyrs of leading prohibitionists, and probably will, but it cannot kill the cause. Nay, every martyr will give it thousands of votes, and equity will break into fragments kingdoms, and republics, too, in case they get in the way. Equity is crying, as she did twenty-five years ago, "more room!" So get out of the way by falling into the rear line, ye political hacks, or else adopt the living issues of to-day, and so take the front. If there is any one thing above all others for which we are supremely grateful, it is our blood-bought freedom, in the sovereign use of which we can, in defiance of political and lodge-bound despots, pray, teach and vote as we will. This will is the bed-rock of all virtue. When wicked agencies of this and of the nether world strike their tools on this puritanic flint, they dull, and quit the job.

UNCOMFORTABLE PRAISE.

BY NINA HOWARTH.

Of course I don't know, as I never was there. But, I may venture an opinion in regard to the feelings of a Mason, if he as a Mason can have, and has an average conception of the fitness of things, when he becomes aware of the fact that his wife is often rendering herself ridiculous in the attempt to defend Masonry on the strength of her faith in him. She has no other argument, being, as he desires she should be, wholly ignorant of the fact that her husband, in whose integrity she has an implicit and unreasoning confidence, is possessed of a double nature, one native, the other acquired; a double character, one for open day and the exercise of humane and social qualities, the other blackened and charred by his unlawful, blasphemous lodge duties and affiliations. If she were conscious of this, and endowed with but half the finer instincts of true womanhood, she would shrink from him, as from contact with the most loathsome reptile. This is a position for which the principles of Masonry fit a man.

As an instance of this unenviable situation, I will relate a little episode in my own experience. It is almost a year ago. I had rented a house in East Saginaw, and had returned to Flint, where I had been living, for the purpose of packing and shipping my household goods; this had occupied my time for several days. Every arrangement being completed, and feeling very tired, I resolved to spend the night with my friend, Mrs. Lyscomb, who, the next morning presented me with a large bundle of Anti-masonic pamphlets and tracts. At the depot I found that the train was an hour behind time, and to while away that hour I untied my bundle to see what I had and what I could do. I was seated near a window by the side of a young lady; and I noticed a gentleman standing close to the window, on the outside. While I was looking over the reading matter, some figures prepared for initiation attracted her attention.

"Oh! excuse my rudeness, and allow me to ask, what have you there?" she exclaimed with childish eagerness; and in a rather loud voice, which I saw, by the start he gave, was heard by the man out on the platform.

"Some Masonic expositions."

"Oh! let me look at them, please."

While she spoke the man came in. He was a gentleman in dress and bearing. His watch and chain supplied with as many mysterious emblems, charms, etc., as its length and breadth would allow. He stood by the stove quite near us, but unnoticed by the lady. I had placed in her hand one of the papers, and, after looking it over, she handed it back, saying, "I know Masonry is not what that sheet represents it to be."

"Do you? May I enquire, have you proof that it is not?"

Here the man by the stove showed uneasiness, but the earnest little lady was all unconscious of the disquiet occasioned by her zeal.

"Because my husband is a Mason, and I know he would never go through such disgraceful performances as those."

"Will you please tell me how you know he would not?"

"He is a decent man, one of the kindest husbands woman ever had. Besides he is a Christian; prays night and morning—things he could not do, if he was that wicked."

The tears came into her eyes as she spoke, though she tried to force them back. The man at the stove was becoming excited, pacing back and forth. The waiting-room was well filled, and some began to give us attention.

"Have you any testimony, other than the good qualities of your Masonic husband?"

"Yes, our minister is a high Mason, and nothing could make me believe him so base and inconsistent as to belong to a society which practiced such vulgar wickedness."

"Will you tell me the name of the church thus honored?"

"We are Baptists."

"And does your church bear her honors with becoming meekness?"

"What honors? I don't understand you."

"Never mind. I will now tell you in just as few words as I can, and in the name and fear of the Lord, what I think of the evidence you have presented in vindication of the lodge power."

At this juncture a gentleman, who had been sitting at a little distance from us, and had undoubtedly taken in the whole situation, arose, walked to the side of the discomfited husband, and, giving a sign, began to gesticulate as only a secretist can.

"I admit," I continued, "that the presence of church members and their pastors gives tone and a reputation for sanctity to the secret lodge. This affords the best—yes, all the evidence that can be alleged in their favor. This fact Masons parade before the world, with great satisfaction and pride. But the man who is playing the double role, of minister of the Gospel in temples professedly consecrated to the service of God in open day before the world, then secretly and in darkness enters a lodge, a temple dedicated with heathen, blasphemous rites, to the worship of Satan, is acting a part, of which the devil would be ashamed. A man may be a good husband and a Mason; but if he is a Mason, and can pray in his family or church, it only proves that he has a Mason's elastic conscience, that's all."

The train soon arrived, and after taking a seat about midway in a coach, I took a survey to see whether or not there were among my fellow passengers any whom I knew. As I did so I beheld the Mason and his devoted wife just entering the door; the one with a very stern face, the other with very red eyes. There were a number of Masons in the waiting-room, and some of them were in the coach. Many had been the shoulder shrugs, and I met many a frowning glance, before I reached Saginaw.

THE FOLLY OF LODGERY.

FROM A LECTURE BY H. C. S., TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN FOR THE LUTHERAN STANDARD.

I affirm: Whoever knows the truth with regard to these lodges, and their real object, or purpose, must find it utterly impossible ever to join one. And this is the case with every intelligent, upright man, and more so with an earnest Christian.

Supposing you ask one of your acquaintances who joined a lodge: "Friend, how can you practice such foolish and childish ceremonies with your brothers of the lodge, as we find them prescribed in your ritual," what will his answer be? "Well, our ceremonies are fooleries, I know it, as well as you; but other things please me well, and first of all, being a member of my lodge helps me very much." The majority of secret societyists attest that childish foolery is practiced in the lodge. It would be a hard thing to contradict it. Every one sees it at once. And this is my first argument, why no sensible and upright man should join a lodge. Such foolery is enough.

First of all look at the foolish names they have given themselves. Some call themselves Freemasons, and are neither masons nor free, but are burdened and bound by dreadful oaths. Others call themselves Odd-Fellows, i. e. peculiar brothers or foolish boys. Cuckoo-like they call themselves by the right name, but by doing so bring upon themselves ridicule and laughter by it. Others would be called Redmen, i. e. wild Indians, but are nevertheless very tame people. Some again use the name Druids, not knowing whom they imitate, namely, the ancient heathen priests of Germany; they are happy to be apes. And it is the same with all the other names.

Again, at times we see their street-parades, representing terrible warriors; using iron scull-caps and swords, bow and arrows, spears and regalia, are clothed with apron and collars, with colored rags and ribbons. But after looking those frightful heroes in the face, you find one to be a very peaceable tailor, who instead of his needle now carries the terrible lance—and another you find to be a modest barber, who instead of his razor for a little while flourishes the fearful sword. Well, little children may be excused, if they play Indian, and scare each other; frolicsome students are allowed to dress themselves as pope and cardinals, in order to ridicule popery. But to see citizens and heads of families in the open street participating in foolish child's play and to hear them give the assurance, that such play is not play at all, but is meant in good earnest and sincerity, this impresses every reasonable man with the feeling that the thing is silly and ridiculous in the extreme.

Their high honors and titles a yard in length, are childish also. I refrain to say anything to-day about their sacrilegious use of such names, as All Puissant Sovereign, Host of Peace, Lord of Hosts. But childish it is, to hear your neighbor, the cobbler, who has laid aside his strap and dressed himself with his colored rags in the lodge-room, all at once addressed as Right-Worshipful-Grand-Supreme-Forester, or to see the very man who waited in his saloon upon his guests only a quarter of an hour ago, in the lodge-room play the part of Reverend-Grand-High-Priest or Past-Grand-Chaplain.

Childish, to say the least, are also the ceremonies, used in several lodges at the initiation of new members. To divest a person of all his clothing, to put a rope around his neck, to lay him in a coffin, to touch his breast with the point of swords, to utfer terrible threats—and such things are done to scare weak men—these are, to say the least, tricks so childish, that no sober man should have anything to do with them.

And yet this is only one argument. Lodges have not only much that is foolish child's play, but also much which is truly dangerous and open to suspicion. This is my second argument, why an honest and reasonable man never ought to join a lodge.

They are behind closed doors during the dark hours of night, guarded by armed men. None of the uninitiated may enter these secret places. They do not deny that they have secrets, neither do they deny, that they swear with solemn oaths, and partly under the penalty of fearful punishments, that they will keep these secrets inviolate and subject themselves to inhuman revenge. Now, what are their secrets? I do not say that they are without exception dangerous and immoral. I do not believe, that every candidate must sign away his soul with pen dipped in his own blood, as we hear it said. I am willing to think, that excepting a few signs of recognition, which are also child's play, empty bubbles are blown in the lodge; that it is the merest humbug, with which fools are paid off, and not profound or exalted secrets. But, who knows that? Who gives the assurance, that not worse things are hidden under their play? Who will accuse him that expects nothing laudable in such men? If only child's play, why this boasting about importance, etc.? If their intents are good and laudable, why such anxiety in guarding them? He, whose intentions are good, shuns not the light. Let me tell you what in former days, and very likely to-day yet, an Entered Apprentice of Masonry had to swear: "I in the presence of Almighty God . . . promise and swear, that I will ever . . . conceal . . . the secrets . . And this under no less penalty, than to have my throat cut across, my tongue torn out by the root, . . . (second degree) my heart taken from my left breast . . . (third degree) my body burned to ashes and the ashes scattered . . . " This is the substance of a Freemason's oathes. Similar, but not so terrible, is the obligation of an Odd-fellow. Who will blame men, when they suspect the worst? Can a wife otherwise than with a heavy heart see her husband go to the lodge? Who will say that it would be wrong, if our government, the State, the mass of citizens, should investigate or inquire, what two millions of male inhabitance are doing, who, organized as they are, linked together by awful oaths, assemble once a week in the night, at places where only God's eyes witness their proceedings? He, to whom all this would not be very suspicious, cannot have his eyes open.

THE GRAND ORIENT DEFIED.

Paris, and France itself, is agog with the recent revelation of Masonry by M. Andrieux, a government official, and the warning he has received from his lodge that the fearful penalties of his oath would be inflicted upon him. The affair has been regarded of so much importance that the correspondence has been cabled to this country and has appeared in a number of our large dailies. The two dispatches appear below. The Grand Orient is the name of the Grand Lodge of France—the same which a few years ago rejected the name of God from its ritual:

PARIS, Feb. 1.—[Via Bennett-Mackay Cable to the Tribune.]—M. Andrieux, Prefect of Police, has outdone all previous revelations in Friday's installment of his "Souvenirs." Like many others who have held high posts under the Republic, he was once an active member of a Freemason lodge. On being appointed Prefect of Police, he thought it right to leave the Grand Orient of France. He says he could not serve two masters. He thus describes his initiation into the awful mysteries of the order:

"I asked leave to enter the Lodge of Silence—so-called, no doubt, because lawyers were chiefly its members. The President was M. le Royer, now President of the Senate. Unknown brethren seized hold of me, put a bandage across my eyes, and hurried me into a subterranean place. Here my bandage was unbound, and by the light of a pale flame I saw bare walls on which were placed here and there death's-heads and human bones. I was asked to write my will, and did so as follows: 'I leave my debts to my family and the rest to the poor.' I was only 23 years old—that was my excuse. I was then taken into the inner temple, red, green, and yellow flames marking my path as if they were fires of hell. A chalice was given me to drain therefrom the 'drink of bitterness,' as it was called. It was no other than that aperient liquor which, under the name of Vermouth, vies with absinthe. Holding in my hand a compass, one of the points of which was directed toward my breast, I had to promise not to divulge the secrets of Freemasonry under penalty of having my head cut off, my tongue cut out, and my body thrown into the ocean to be eternally tossed about by the flow and wash of the sea."

M. Andrieux adds that he would not have made these revelations had he not come to the conclusion that Freemasons liked to have a good laugh. After this remarkable revelation the continuation of M. Andrieux's "Souvenirs" is brought abruptly and mysteriously to a close.

PARIS, Feb. 11.—M. Andrieux, ex-Prefect of Police, has received an official communication from the Masonic lodge in which he was initiated, charging him with violation of his Masonic oath not to divulge the secrets of Masonry. His alleged revelations were published a fortnight ago in La Ligue, M. Andrieux's newspaper, and cabled to the Globe-Democrat, [N. Y. Herald, Chicago Tribune, etc.] The following is a translation of the Masonic letter:

"Parfait Silence Loge, chap. et areopage constituee a l'or de lyon, l' an de la v. l. 5762. Au Local Mosanique, 5 rue Garibaldi, Lyon, o ·.·de Lyon, 5 Fevrier, 1885. Monsieur: The R. L., the Parfait Silence, received at its meeting February 4, 1885, a complaint against you. Owing to the publications in La Ligue of the 29th and 30th of January you have rendered yourself liable to the application of the second paragraph of article five of the statutes concerning the violation of the Masonic oath. The matter has been referred to the Executive Committee, which now demands if you have any observation to make concerning the crime with which you are accused. The committee meets again on February 11. If by that date you shall not have replied to the charge, the committee will then declare whether the penalty for the violation of your Masonic oath shall be pronounced against you. Le Com. de la R.·. L.·. le Parfait Silence.

"P. S.—Your reply should be addressed No. 5 rue Garibaldi."

The following is the reply of M. Andrieux, which, however, was not sent to the address indicated, but was published in La Ligue: "I have an observation to make, but as I am a partisan of public debate, I decline private communication, and speak openly in the public press. In the first place, why do you address me as Monsieur, instead of T. G. F. Either I am still a Freemason, in which case you should address me as such, or I am not one, in which case you have no jurisdiction over me. As for the substance of the charge, you pretend that I have violated an oath, the text of which is as follows: 'I do solemnly swear not to reveal the mysteries of Freemasonry, under the penalty of having my head cut off, my tongue torn out, and my body cast into the sea, where it will be forever rolled by the ebb and flow of the tide.' Permit me to observe that in the eyes of Nous outres jurisconsultes, an oath, like a confession, is indivisible. If the first part of your formula is serious, the second part is also. If you talk about the ebb and flow of the tide merely to mock and poke fun at Masons, there is no reason why I should not also poke fun when you talk about your mysteries. I shall not reveal anything, but if I should see fit to reveal anything you should, if your arrangement is serious, submit me to the torture above described. Are you prepared to do so? Etes vous prets.

(Signed) "ANDRIEUX."

Freemasons regard this as an open defiance of one of the most sacred obligations of their institution. It has caused a great sensation in Masonic lodges.

A BIT OF HISTORY.

"And storied ages o'er the memory pass,
Like shadows pictured on a sea of glass."

The senior editor of the Cynosure came to Cincinnati in the fall of 1837, from a year's lecturing in Pennsylvania. The first night I attended a ministers' meeting. While together the news of Elijah P. Lovejoy's death, at Alton, Ill., was brought in and shocked us all. Rev. Artemus Ballard broke the painful silence. "Brethren," said he, "this is what I have expected from the imprudence of that brother;" thus attributing Lovejoy's death to his own "imprudence!" He said not one word against his murderers! And neither he, nor Mills, Dickinson, or even the good Dr. Stowe, or my dear old teacher Dr. Lyman Beecher, at that time said one word against slavery in public, to show what "prudent" opposition to slavery was. I went to my lodgings "sore displeased" and sad at heart. I was a young theological student, and the thought that I might one day do as those ministers did, almost drove me back from the ministry. I lived to see the sin of the clergy of that day, washed out in the blood of half a million Americans. And now, in my old age that history repeats itself. Churches, presbyteries, associations now say "Masonry is an evil" and fellowship Masons; as they then said "Slavery is an evil," and fellowshipped slave holders, and hated Abolitionists. Slavery allowed the worship of Christ; Masonry excludes him. So I sat down and wrote the following which is clipped from the New York Evangelist of that date:

THE VOICE OF BLOOD.

Rev. E. P. Lovejoy was murdered at Alton, Illinois, by a mob of ruffians, who had destroyed his three printing presses, November 7, 1837. His crime was wishing to print in favor of the abolition of slavery. No effort appears to have been made by the civil authorities to repress the violence which was long and openly denounced, to preserve his property or protect his life. The roof of the building where he was was fired. and he was shot down when he came out to extinguish the flames.

I'M THE VOICE OF BLOOD! and I wail along
As the wind sweeps sullenly by,
All choked and still in its wonted song,
As soft, or solemn, or brisk, or strong,
It sung to the answering sky.
One breath—one shuddering breath—a moan,
Like the flap of a pall on a coffin of stone,
Or a dead man's last, long sigh!

It comes to thee, ALTON, by day or by night,
Where Freedom's champion stood;
And the child, when he hears it, shall cry for light!
Though the sun is high and the day is bright;
And the mother, in frantic mood,
Shall shriek, as it mutters, the cradle near,
In a whisper so loud that the dead might hear,
"I AM BLOOD!—THE VOICE OF BLOOD!"

In street, lane, and alley, in parlor and hall,
That sepulchre voice is there—
Crying, "Hear! hear the martyr's imploring call;
O God! see the blood!—how it follows the ball,
As he sinks like the song of despair;
But I come—the precusor of sorrow—I come,
In church-aisle and dwelling, in cellar and dome,
To cry with the tongue of the air."

"O could ye not hear when the young mother plead
For the babe starting wild by her side!—
Must her husband's cold bosom, then, pillow her head,
And her warm kiss, impressed on the lips of the dead,
Excite no emotion but pride!
I tell thee, Proud City, the vengeance of God
Shall be felt, if not feared, on thy Golgotha sod,
Where the martyr of Liberty died."

Wake, wake, ILLINOIS! for through prairie and glen,
There is blood! there's the voice of blood!
It bids thee arouse, or the rust on their chain,
Shall scar the fair necks of your daughters—a stain
Bleached alone by your heart's hot flood;
Your sons low in manacles crouch at your feet,
Where the prairie fowl starts as the young lambkins bleat,
In the fields where your free dwellings stood.

Rouse, rouse thee! or purchase for Freedom a shroud,
And bury your hopes in her grave;
Then, hushed be the glee of your laborers proud,
As, driven with the mule and the ass in a crowd
They slink to the task of the slave—
With a curse on their lip, and a scowl in their eye,
As they mope by your tombstones and tauntingly cry,
"Ho! here go the sons of the brave!"

However much the politicians may try to dodge it, the saloon question is bound to come to the front in one form or another. In tens of thousands of local elections throughout the country local option, license or no license, is the paramount issue every spring.—Inter Ocean.

An Irish conspirator, on his way to San Francisco, to take the steamer to Australia, being followed by English detectives, threw a package containing an infernal machine out of the car window. His intention was to go to Australia and blow up a prison in which are confined some Fenian prisoners.

BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS:

OR

THE QUESTION OF THE HOUR.

BY E. E. FLAGG, AUTHOR OF "HOLDEN WITH CORDS."

CHAPTER XI.—Concluded.

The strike continued, with no prospect of a speedy end; and many of the workmen found their unoccupied hours dragged less heavily if passed in some place of common resort. Unluckily there were enough saloons left in Jacksonville to supply that want; and they furnished precisely the soil needed for the sprouting of socialistic tares, though the previously mentioned "Union agent," having finished his seed sowing, had some time before left for "pastures new." The saloon-keepers, warned by the popular storm which had so nearly wrecked their business, and with some little fear of the W. C. T. U., practiced more circumspection and more secrecy; but bar-rooms fitted up underground may be as favorable gathering-places as the cave of Adullam for "every one that is discontented" with the prevailing order of society; and it is certain that over the fiery potations there dealt out strange threats were sometimes uttered, and the speeches of noted communistic leaders quoted with a gusto that would have been far from pleasant to peaceful and law-abiding ears.

"I believe there is more drink sold in Jacksonville now than before the strike," said Nelson to Martin Treworthy one morning in the latter part of February. "What is our 'temperance' mayor about?"

"Fulfilling his Masonic obligations," growled Martin. "Liquor men and Good Templars voted together for him last fall, so now he's got to be 'all things to all men' in a sense the Apostle Paul never dreamed of. But then it comes tolerable easy to a man that has taken a dozen or two of Masonic degrees."

"The strike ought to have been at an end long ago," said Nelson, choosing to ignore this explanation of the case. "I know men that were steady and industrious before it happened, and now they spend in drink half the money allowed them by the Union to support their families. It is ruinous, it is suicidal—this long, fruitless strife in which nothing is gained and everything lost on the side least capable of bearing loss. It is the ambition and selfishness of men like Gerrish and Reynolds that is prolonging this state of affairs, and I've about made up my mind to break with the Union entirely if I've got to be under such leaders."

A dry smile curled Martin's lips. He was not at all averse to seeing this young Hercules of labor chafe under his lodge fetters. Perhaps Nelson did not see the smile. He went on.

"They have stood from the first of it right in the way of any adjustment of the difficulty. The manufacturers were ready for a compromise long ago, that the majority of the men—I for one—would have been willing to accept. Here we are losing money and time, and suffering all the demoralizing influences that come from idleness. But what do these men care for that? They don't want to see the wrongs of labor righted. It is for their interest to keep up this strife and contention. It is the way they get their living. They are too lazy to work, and to beg they are ashamed, but they manage some way to get all the offices themselves, and wear their kid gloves and draw their comfortable salaries, and we working men must submit to their tyranny."

The reader may perhaps remember that Nelson had once himself innocently informed Martin Treworthy that the leaders of the Union were generally Masons or Odd-fellows. But the latter made no allusion to this fact as furnishing a possible key to the mystery of these easy berths. Experience was beginning to teach Nelson a good many truths before unheeded, and he was quite willing to leave him for awhile to the tutelage of this stern instructor.

"The fact is they represent no interests but their own, and I don't wonder the manufacturers refuse to treat with them. I should in their place. I heard to-day that the works were going to start up next week with a large force of non-union laborers, and if the new hands can't be intimidated or bought off there will be trouble. I see it and feel it."

"And that no man might buy or sell save he that had the mark or the name of the beast or the number of his name," slowly repeated Martin Treworthy.

"But I always thought the beast was popery. Commentators explain it so," added Nelson, innocently.

"When I see prophecy fulfilled right before my eyes I don't have to go to the D.D.s" returned Martin, dryly. "But I hain't got no grudge against Masonry for anything it has done to me, though I remember in one of the first battles of the war how, as we were retiring, I turned right back in the very face of the rebs as they were dashing down hill—I don't know what possessed me unless it was the spirit of Gideon—and picked up our colors and carried them safe into camp; but I never got any promotion for it, though I was told if I'd only been a Mason I should have got promoted fast enough."

"That was shameful injustice," said Nelson, indignantly.

"I want you to understand," replied Martin Treworthy, coolly, "that its losing me a pair of shoulder-straps don't make it that there's any debt or credit account between us. Why, I read that thirteenth chapter in Revelations nigh a hundred times on my bended knees before the Lord revealed to me what it meant. It was the Spirit of the Lord that taught me to hate Masonry, not anything it has done to me or mine. It seemed as if I could see the beast, and the long procession of worshipers filing up—lawyers that wanted clients, and ministers that wanted pulpits, and politicians that wanted office; and all the murderers and adulterers and rumsellers that wanted to get clear of the gallows and the jail; small and great, rich and poor, bond and free, wearing his mark on their foreheads or in their hands. Then the thought came to me that worship always implies a religion of some kind, and so the beast must represent some universal religion. And as it was in the likeness of a lamb, but not the Lamb as it had been slain, it must be a religion of works without any atonement. And with that the Holy Spirit flashed the truth right into my mind. As Masonry required worship without Christ, and promised salvation without repentance, it was the only religion that would suit the natural heart everywhere. And I saw that in its pride, lust of power, blasphemy, and spirit of persecution, it was an image of the old papal beast; and every secret order, whether it was in Russia, Africa or America, was an image of Masonry. A religion that will suit everybody, Jew or Christian or heathen, must be the same in principle the world over, and yet be able to change its outward shape. That is what Masonry does in all the little secret orders; it changes its shape, but it is the same thing at heart—anti-Christ, whose coming is with all manner of deceiveableness. And when the Lord showed me this I was astonished like Ezekiel by the river of Chebar. But I knew there was more light to come. So I considered further on the matter, and I saw that until the time of the end all the great world powers like slavery and rum and Mormonism would 'agree to give their kingdom unto the beast.' And from the day that the Spirit of the Lord revealed this to me—mind, I hadn't read a tract, book, or paper about it then—I've fought the evil thing with might and main, and I mean to keep on fighting it to the last. To see the victory will be for younger eyes than mine, but I'm satisfied so long as I know who my Leader is."

And the grizzly-headed hero of more and different battles than Nelson ever dreamed of took his departure, leaving the latter feeling rather uncomfortable. He was thoroughly disgusted with the tyranny of the Union, while his apprehensions of more serious trouble yet to follow made the low, monotonous undertone of Martin Treworthy's speech seem like the far off thunders of a coming judgment.

Could he have overheard a conversation that was going on meanwhile in one of the basement saloons at which the new mayor, in due respect to his Masonic vows, had found it convenient to wink, it would only have darkened his musings.

Beside a table covered with green cloth, each with a glass of beer before him, sat two men. In the features of one was a hint of Celtic extraction; he had very white teeth that, when he smiled, seemed to have the treacherous gleam of a wild beast's, was graceful in person, and rather particular about his dress—a kind of Americanized Robespierre. It is not an enjoyable fact to ponder, but it is a fact nevertheless, that we have in our midst men of the same type with that blood-thirsty triumvirate who ruled Paris in '93, though our American sun of freedom shines rather too brightly in their eyes, and they generally burrow in the darkness of illicit saloons and secret lodges.

The other man was coarse-featured, large-boned, much given to profanity, and wore a Knight Templar's badge conspicuously displayed. The fumes of their cigars mingled sociably together as they sipped their beer and conversed in low and confidential tones; and, in short, they answered very well to that graphic description given by David in the sixty-fourth psalm of the wicked "in secret counsel."

"Don't forget a good stiff glass of whisky all round to prime 'em up for the job, Reynolds," said the personage first described. At which reminder the other only nodded as if he was in no danger of neglecting so important a matter, while the first one continued.

"That cranky fool, Newhall, must be made to hold his tongue. All the opposition to the strike has been stirred up by him."

"Not so easy; he's deep as a well."

"A knife for traitors," was the significant response. This laconic remark, however, was not quite original, being in reality quoted from a late speech of Herr Most.

"If you ain't a cool one, Gerrish!" exclaimed the other with an oath, clapping his companion on the shoulder. "You'd be a match for the devil himself."

"Bah!" was the scornful reply. "Keep that old woman's talk to yourself. I don't believe in a devil no more than I do in a God. Men are what we've got to deal with in this age of the world."

Reynolds was used to being snubbed and lectured by his chief, and his only answer was to drain his glass and meekly wait further orders.

But of this precious pair, in whose creed dynamite and whisky were the leading articles of belief, we shall give the reader out of respect to his moral and religious scruples at being placed in such company, but the briefest possible glimpse. Reynolds was blacklisted—discharged for his own fault, but he represented himself as persecuted for belonging to the Union, and played the martyr role with such success that he found himself hoisted at once into a place of power and notoriety very much to his liking, and where he drew a salary larger than his lost wages. He was obliged to play second fiddle to Gerrish, however, for though not so much of a bully and a blackguard the latter was a born leader, and by far the more dangerous of the two. He had not been long in Jacksonville, and Nelson as well as many of his fellow-workmen were inclined to resent this dictatorial sway of one whose antecedents were so little known, quite forgetting that there was a slight inconsistency involved in such a state of feeling. Had they not sworn to obey all the rules and regulations of the Grand Lodge? thus virtually placing themselves under the complete despotic control of its chief—a man they knew as little about as they did of the Shah of Persia?

The variety of uses to which secrecy may be put is an important but neglected branch of knowledge among the great bulk of its simple-minded members. Missionaries in Africa tell us of secret societies among the natives, under whose wings of darkness, demon-worship, kidnapping and cannibalism are as freely practiced as more civilized crimes in the safe shelter of a lodge of Masons, Odd-fellows, or Knights of Pythias. How long before Christians in America will be as wise as their brethren in Africa and refuse to fellowship secretism in any form even when disguised in the holy garments of temperance? How long before temperance workers will understand that the cause of God and the cause of the devil cannot be fought with the same weapons; that in taking the vows of secrecy they are actually striking hands with all the Masonic saloon-keepers, brewers and distillers, as well as their Masonic allies in our courts and legislative halls? How long before honest workingmen will understand that when they join a secret trades union they are joined as one body to the dark, aristocratic, monarchial, anti-republican institution of Freemasonry; and through it with the Nihilist, the Socialist, the Ku Klux—men whose profession it is to stir up rebellion, revolution, anarchy; and who without the aid of liquor, labor's greatest enemy and curse, could not achieve half the triumphs they have in the past or will in the future unless God in his mercy opens the eyes of our nation to its danger?

There can be but one answer to such questions. Society will never frown upon any evil that the church tolerates. Political action will never be taken against it till Christian voters and Christian statesmen demand such action. When Zion puts on her beautiful garments; when she casts out of her midst with scorn and loathing every thing that would defile her purity; when she shows herself "terrible as an army with banners" against every form of sin and iniquity, then the honest temperance worker and the hard-handed son of labor will no longer believe a lie; and evil men and seducers will have a foretaste of the coming terrors of that Judgment Day when they shall say to the rocks and to the mountains, "Fall on us and hide us from the wrath of the Lamb."

A great step is gained when a child has learned that there is no necessary connection between liking a thing and doing it.—Guesses at Truth.

THE PROTEST OF THE PRESS.

From the Christian Union, New York.

"Whatever may be the merits or demerits of Freemasonry, it is a private and not a public institution, and embraces in its membership but a fraction of the male inhabitants of the country. We are, therefore, at a loss to understand on what principle of propriety or common sense this secret fraternity is so often intrusted with the duty of laying the corner-stones of public buildings, to be devoted to purposes in which all classes of the community, without regard to sect or party, have a common interest. What claim to such official recognition has Freemasonry over Oddfellowship? Or, why should either be selected for such a service rather than the Catholics, the Episcopalians, the Presbyterians, the Baptists or the Methodists? Either of these bodies, we suspect, is as truly representative of the whole people as Freemasonry or any other secret society. Moreover, thousands of people are conscientiously opposed to secret societies, and the use of these ceremonies on such occasions, is to them an offence. Are not the officers of the United States, of the various grades, competent to lay the corner-stones of buildings to be used for public purposes? Why, then, call in the aid of a secret association, whose ceremonies, however beautiful in themselves or in the eyes of the "craft," are yet distasteful to multitudes of intelligent and conscientious people?

From the Free Press, Birmingham, Iowa.

In one respect, however, it is eminently fitting that the great organization, which shelters and protects nearly all the defaulting bank officers and government officials, should have a hand in the dedication of a monument at the centre, where so much stealing is done. But it should not be called Washington monument, but the rogues' monument. Then let General Albert Pike and Jefferson Davis lead the van, let ex-Senator Dorsey and the other star-route thieves follow after, flanked by Ingersoll and the other lawyers, who pocketed such a large slice of the stealings; then bring on the army officers, who are short in their accounts; then the other officials who cheat the government; then the defaulters, forgers, wire-pullers, and,——but hold, Washington has enough rogues in it now, and if it was filled up with all these, there is danger that the doom of Sodom may overtake it.

GLADSTONE ON WASHINGTON.

The Tribune publishes a very interesting interview between Mr. Smalley, its London correspondent, and Mr. Wm. E. Gladstone, the English Premier. Speaking of the character of public men, Mr. Gladstone remarked:

"Washington, to my mind, is the purest figure in history."

At the request of Mr. Smalley, Mr. Gladstone afterwards wrote him a letter giving his views on these subjects from which we take the following extract:

When I first read in detail the Life of Washington, I was profoundly impressed with the moral elevation and greatness of his character, and I found myself at a loss to name among the statesmen of any age or country many, or possibly any, who could be his rival. In saying this I mean no disparagement to the class of politicians, the men of my own craft and cloth; whom, in my own land, and my own experience, I have found no less worthy than other men, of love and of admiration. I could name among them those who seem to me to come near even to him. But I will shut out the last half century from the comparison. I will then say that if, among all the pedestals supplied by history for public characters of extraordinary nobility and purity, I saw one higher than all the rest, and if I were required at a moment's notice to name the fittest occupant for it, I think my choice, at any time during the last forty-five years would have lighted, and it would now light, upon Washington.

Mr. Smalley says that all the English gentlemen who were present when Mr. Gladstone expressed this opinion of Washington agreed with him.—N. Y. Witness.

—The Moderator of the Presbyterian church of Victoria has sent cable despatches to the heads of the churches in Scotland and Ireland protesting against the annexation by France of the New Hebrides Islands as tending to nullify Christian work performed in those islands in the last thirty-six years.

—The Standard says: "Mr. Hebbun, a Presbyterian missionary in Japan, is rather sanguine in regard to the hold Christianity has obtained upon the people of that country. He doubts whether missionaries will be needed there fifteen or twenty years hence, and thinks that if even all the foreign missionaries were expelled at once, the work would be carried forward by the natives. It is encouraging that an intelligent missionary upon the ground is thus sanguine, and though we may not coincide with his views, yet there is no doubt but that the 'Island Empire' will become Christian at comparatively an early date from the opening of the country to its entrance, less than forty years ago."

CORRESPONDENCE.

NO COMPROMISE IN POLITICS OR CHURCH

SHILOH, Iowa.

EDITOR CYNOSURE, DEAR BRO:—The conclusion you came to after your recent visit to Olathe in reference to St. John is what I have been wanting and waiting to see, and had intended to write the Cynosure to that end. But it is out now and I hope there will be no shrinking or going back on it with St. John. We supported him at some sacrifice to the American party, at some sacrifice (in the estimation of those unfriendly to our voting for prohibition) for consistency; and you remember what I said some time since in the American on this point, and I am of the same mind yet. We want no man for leader who will not show his colors.

In the late campaign the position of the American party was about like that of a man who had courted a girl, proposed marriage, and having gone through with his part of the wedding ceremony the bride would not respond. I notice when a blacksmith wants to make a weld that will stick he is careful to get both pieces of iron of equal temperature, and then he can't make a good job unless the dross is sufficiently worked out. So it strikes me if the American party ever unites with the Prohibition party, it will not be till the dross of secrecy is worked out of that party so that it can be sufficiently enthused with the spirit of prohibition to unite with those who are, as we believe.

Now, in regard to the conference and conciliation committee of the College church of Wheaton. I hope and pray that it may be guided by the Spirit of God as manifested in his Son, who though mild and gentle as a lamb, yet had no compromise to make with Satan, nor allowance for sin inasmuch as he had come to save his people from their sins and not in them. It is of the utmost importance to the cause of reform that the Wheaton church maintain her position on the question of secrecy. Lowering the standard or making concessions that might be construed into a compromise will be made capital of against the cause, hence we are exhorted to avoid even the appearance of evil. My prayer is that the Lord may direct.

JOHN DORCAS.

A FAITH MISSIONARY'S DAUGHTER.

NICODEMUS, Graham Co., Kan., Feb. 14, 1885.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE:—Your paper of February 5th came in containing the "Remonstrance." Fearing we would be late in getting any returns to you in time, yet feeling like doing all we can to help on the Anti-masonic wave that is sweeping o'er our land, Carrie, my daughter, has taken the remonstrance and started out with it. It is snowing and blowing, and we wish to send it on to-day's train, therefore, we shall not get as many names as we otherwise could.

I am teaching a Faith Mission school here among the colored people. There are a number of them that are Freemasons, and it has been desired by some to open a lodge here. I am doing all I can to oppose and enlighten the people as to its unchristian and foolish mummeries, as carried on in the lodge.

I see Carrie has succeeded in securing several names, foremost that of a young man who has attained to the Royal Arch degree, who still has sense enough to understand that as it is a Nation's monument, its dedication should not be given into the hands of a faction. Yours for truth and right,

MRS. GERTIE M. CASE.

THE REMONSTRANCE BRINGS OUT THE PEOPLE.

MONTMORENCI, Ind.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—On the 11th inst. I mailed you forty-five honorable names—names of the best citizens of our county, best for intelligence, sobriety, education, integrity and godliness,—all against Masonic rites being allowed at the dedication of our National monument at Washington, D. C., February 22, 1885. I drove in a sleigh about forty miles—the last day of my travels was through a terrible snowstorm, but it found most of the people at home, and most of them opposed to Freemasonry. Had I known it a few days sooner I think I could have gotten 150 names or more by going personally to men in their families. In a few cases the women signed it when the men refused, but in no case the reverse. Women instinctively oppose secrecy. I asked several Masons to sign. One or more did so. The old Masons can better see the devil in the lodge; but the younger Masons are confident, one remarking, "there is little enough good being done in the world without trying to destroy what is left," meaning that the Masons did all the good there was done!

I think we are coming on to one of the most effectual modes of breaking as well as reproving the intrusive spirit of secretism, in getting the people to remonstrate. A great majority of the people are against the lodge business, and when it doesn't cost any more than their signatures they are willing to say so, when they would not take a paper against secret societies. A paper costs money, which is scarce with them, the lodgeites having more than their share through lodgery, but this very fact will induce a dishonest man to join it and divide the spoils. A young man of this kind offered 25 cents for the bare privilege of reading "Freemasonry Illustrated"—then joined the lodge to get the spoils. No other class have yet joined here.

In several cases the Masons some way get a lie started that certain citizens have joined them (which lie being believed induces some others to really join). In the course of time you learn from those men personally that they did not join the lodge and never shall! Truly it is a "refuge of lies." O Lord let thy truth as hail sweep it away forever. Thine is the power. Amen.

Some would not sign because they were not posted. Shall the people perish for lack of knowledge? O may knowledge be increased! L. D. BROWN.

MASONRY DISCOUNTED.

GOODWINE, Ill., Feb. 9, 1885.

EDITORS CYNOSURE:—Not having seen anything from this part of the country lately, I take this occasion to write a few items. In the first place I think the outlook is hopeful. The lodge is not so blatant and domineering. The people do not seem to think the secrets of the lodge sacred. Christian men and women generally regard connection with the lodge, especially the Masonic wing, anything but a recommendation. There are exceptions, however, to all rules.

A Mason not far from me, whom I had supposed was a regular attendant at a Masonic altar, I learned had not been inside of a Masonic hall for several years, and some of those who are attending as a rule are "fast" being moderate or confirmed drinkers or libertines. Of course there are exceptions. But the tendency of the lodge is toward ruin "fast." This is easily accounted for, for the reasons that their meetings are away from the ennobling influence of the gentler and nobler sex. Also their meetings are after night with locked and tyled doors. Also that the entire membership know that the institution is a grand fraud and imposition, with its idolatrous worship, "cut-throat" oaths, and brutal initiations. Is it any wonder that the membership is under par morally? The great wonder is that they are not worse; and but for outside influence such would be the fact.

Recently in reading up the terrible acts of the dynamiters in London I could not avoid comparing those damnable acts with such damnable oaths as the three first degrees in Masonry. No adjective short of "damnable" will measure up to the moral degradation taught and occasionally practiced by the dynamiters and the lodgeites. Let the readers of this article read carefully the three first Masonic oaths, and they will find in them moral (?) dynamite, consisting of treason, murder, adultery, etc. Masonic authority says it is "the obligation" that makes the Mason, and yet, we, the people, have these lodge charters spread on our statute books, and the people pay for the printing, paper, binding, etc. Let us agitate until such blotches are wiped off of our statute books. J. S. HICKMAN.

HOW ANTI-MASONRY DEFEATS ITSELF.

A certain physician of my acquaintance who is a Freemason argues that the Anti-mason defeats his object by exposing the principles of Freemasonry. He argues thus from the fact that those principles are so congenial to many that they have but to be announced to be embraced. And many enter the lodge who would never have thought of doing so had it not been for the Anti-masonic lecturer.

He defends his position by the following illustrations: A certain acquaintance of his had several daughters and was very solicitous about the preservation of their virtue, so much so that he was careful to enlighten them concerning the nature of vice. But contrary to the hopes of the father, in consequence of the enlightenment every one of his daughters became an abandoned woman. The physician of my acquaintance is so far consistent that he is not an affiliating Mason; and it appears that he is well aware of the fact that falsehood is more congenial to the mind of the natural man than truth; and also the striking analogy between the violation of the seventh commandment and that spiritual idolatry so severely condemned and reprobated by the word of the Lord.

Now in reply to the physician we freely admit that it is a shame to mention the esoteric works of Masonry. But while Paul said concerning a certain class of sceretists, "It is a shame to speak of the things done by them in secret," he commanded that they be disfellowshipped and rebuked: and in order that people may be rebuked their sins must be mentioned, and mention of sin of any sort will but the more strikingly exhibit the line of separation that rearly exist between the natural and the spiritual man. When Joseph was brought face to face with a great sin that violates the seventh commandment, he exelaimed, "How can I do this great wickedness and sin against God?" And so it ever will be, when sin is mentioned in the presence of the godly they will abhor it. As to its effect upon the ungodly they must be warned of the wrath of God that is revealed from heaven against all the ungodly; and that the government of God both in regard to this world and that to come, may be vindicated the sins of the people and the certain wrath of God consequent thereupon must be proclaimed aloud to all to whom God will send his love.

"Cry aloud, spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet and shew my people their transgression, and the house of Jacob their sins." Is. 58: 1. Then let the infamous blasphemy and base idolatry of Freemasonry be flung into the faces of all the people from every pulpit in the land until every Freemason shall be ashamed to show himself in a house of God.

AN INQUIRY.

SCHUYLER'S LAKE, N. Y.

Knight states near the close of the third chapter, Vol. VII. of his "Popular History of England" that "Washington regarded with alarm the societies modeled upon the Jacobin clubs, which had sprung up in the United States." Does this refer to the order of the Cincinnati, to the higher degrees of French Masonry of the Snyder correspondence or what was their peculiar denomination and object?

This may perhaps afford additional ground for the belief of some that secret societies were probably intended by the admonitions against faction in Washington's farewell address. A similar expression against secret societies could scarcely be expected in an American historical work, so careful are our writers of their interests and popularity in excluding all that may be construed into censure of the system.

T.

PROTEST ECHOES.

The letters accompanying lists of names on the Washington Monument protest have by no means been exhausted. A few more good points are selected this week:

OPPOSITION VANISHED.

I did not find the opposition I expected, although this is a hot-bed of secretism. One of the Masons did not read all the reasons, but put his name down, saying that he had given $5 for the monument and wanted the dedication to be national. This locality has been neglected by the lecturers thus far, but we hope ere long to get Mr. Loggan.—JOHN H. HUNTER, Morse, Kan.

THE LARGEST LIST.

A list of 297 names, apparently from Hadley, N. Y., says: "Lots of Masons signed this."

A POOR REASON.

The Anti-masonic element is quite strong here, but some decline to append their names on account of results.—A. R. FEEMSTER, Fulton, Kan.

HEADS AND TAILS

Nearly all have signed; even some of the grangers, who ought to know that they themselves are the very tail end of Masonry.—C. P. POTTER, Guilford Center, Vt.

WANT TO RUN EVERYTHING.

I enclose 21 names; could have got many more had there been time. I hope the Masons will be defeated in their attempt to dedicate the monument. They are getting so that they want to run everything throughout this whole country.—J. P. WINSLOW, Fairmount, Ind.

UNANIMOUS.

Have spent one day in soliciting signatures to the remonstrance. Found the people almost unanimous in protesting against this Masonic ceremony. Could secure many more names if time would permit.—THOMAS P. HITCHCOCK.

A USURPATION.

Enclosed find a list of 27 names of persons opposed to secret societies in general and to Masonry in particular, and who rebel against this usurpation of the people's rights. As for myself I have no language at my command that can begin to express my detestation of the Masonic lodge, and this present outrage seems to be the crowning act of usurpation and insolent rascality. What else shall I call it?—MRS. S. B. OVERHOLT, Nashville, Mich.

A POSSIBLE 500.

I enclose a protest with 70 signers, all voters but one or two. I could get 500 in a short time—E. BASCOM, Greensburg, O.

HEARTILY.

These names have all been freely given, and I have no doubt but more might have been obtained if I had time to solicit them.—ANGELINE M. DANIELS, Sheridan, N. Y.

65 NAMES.

I did not get the paper soon enough to get around before the storm or I could have got as many more.—CHAS. MCILROY, Sparta, Ill.

ONE HOUR AT GATES COLLEGE.

The enclosed is the result of scarcely an hour's work. Doubtless many others would have signed had they been given the opportunity, though as yet this subject has not been agitated in this place. Most of the students believe in anti-secrecy and will, not many years hence, be a power for good in this matter.—W. H. HOLT.

BIBLE LESSONS.

LESSON X.—March 8, 1885.—Paul before Felix. Acts 24: 10-27.

GOLDEN TEXT.—A conscience void of offence toward God and toward men. Acts 24: 16.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. Paul's defence. vs. 10-21. Every Christian ought to be able to point to his own changed life as a sufficient vindication of the truth which he professes; and when the hostile judgment of the world arraigns him at its bar, well for him, and well for Christ's cause if he can show, as Paul did, one consistent purpose governing his every action—one witness in his favor though all men were against him; "a conscience void of offense toward God and toward man." Christians are often accused of raising disturbances, as the wolf in the fable accuses the lamb of muddying the stream. The truth which Paul preached shook the very foundations of human society; it overturned at one sweep the faith of centuries, and brought into every life that embraced it, an entirely new factor. This could not be done without giving a great shock to the existing order of things, the prevalent fashions, customs and prejudices of the day. But we are not responsible for the effect a truth may have. When revealed to us our part is to speak it, even though we are counted disturbers. The efforts of prohibitionists are sometimes misjudged because their immediate result is to divide rather than to unite, and make discord rather than peace. The same is true of the efforts of anti-secretists. They cannot convince men of the danger and harm of secret orders without disturbing Satan's kingdom, but they are no more responsible for the uproar and outrage which follow their work than a candle is responsible for what its light may reveal.

2. The power of truth. vs. 22-27. Tacitus has given Felix a most unenviable character, as cruel, lustful and rapacious. Yet this "bold bad man" trembled before the preaching of Paul. What more striking example of the immense moral weight of God's truth even when delivered by no silver-tongued orator. The apostle's "bodily presence was weak and his speech contemptible;" he wore the manacles of a prisoner. Nor could his life have added much effect to his words for a man like Felix, blinded by his brutish self-indulgence to all its moral sublimity. A gospel which will let men alone in their sins is only half a gospel. Repentance is as necessary as faith. A gospel that preaches against intemperance, lodgery, Sabbath breaking, tobacco, extravagant living, and all forms of iniquity, will make the worst men tremble through the simple power of divine truth echoed by their own consciences. It is not enough to preach simply the cross. We must preach the claims of that violated law which it so fully met, or it will become an unmeaning symbol. This was probably "the most convenient season" to repent of his crimes that had ever come to Felix. He let it slip. The Phillipian jailer also trembled, but he seized the precious moment—Mercy's everlasting Now, and was saved.

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

Who was once accused of troubling Israel? 1 Kings 18: 17. What did Christ's preaching do? Matt. 10: 34. Why should we expect the Gospel to have any different effect now? Will there come any convenient time for souls that reject their opportunity? Prov. 29: 1; Gen. 6: 3.

INTRODUCTION.

We left St. Paul in custody at Cesarea. His enemies at Jerusalem lost no time in following him. Within five days the high priest Ananias, accompanied by a deputation from the Sanhedrim, and by a professional advocate, arrived in Cesarea to lay their information against Paul before the tribunal of Felix. The charge brought against the prisoner seems to have included three particulars: (1) That he was guilty of sedition, and so of disloyalty to the Roman government; (2) that he was guilty of heresy, the ringleader of a sect, and so a renegade from Judaism; (3) that he was guilty of profaning the temple, and thus of affronting a worship which was under the patronage and protection of Rome.—Vaughn. The object of Tertullus, however, appears to be not the condemnation and punishment of Paul by Felix, but his surrender to the Jewish authorities for trial. The lesson begins with the reply of Paul, made at the sign from the governor.—Riddle.

PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS.

"That there are yet but twelve days." Paul arrived at Jerusalem May 17, the date that year of Pentecost. It was now May 30, twelve whole days intervening.

"I went up to Jerusalem for to worship." He went on purpose to worship. Was it likely that he would try to profane the temple or excite sedition?—Cambridge Bible.

"After the way which they call heresy." Better, with rev. version, "after the way which they call a sect." The word is the same which is used in ver. 5 for the "sect" of the Nazarenes. St. Paul employs the expression "the way," in that sense in which it soon became well-known, to signify the Christian religion.—Cambridge Bible. The Greek word of which sect is the translation is the same as our word heresy. It is used in the New Testament of a school of religious opinion, as of the Pharisees (Acts 15: 5) and Sadducees (5: 17), with no implication of erroneous doctrine. The word heresy now implies doctrinal error.—Rev. Com. And even then the implication must have been that if one differed in opinion from the general views, his opinion must be an error.—Peloubet.

"So I worship the God of my fathers." Conybeare and Howson give the argument well. Our nation is divided into religious parties which are called sects; thus there is the sect of the Pharisees, and the sect of the Sadducees, and so now we are called the sect of the Nazarenes. I do not deny that I belong to the latter sect, but I claim for it the same toleration which is extended by the Roman law to the others. I claim the right which you allow to all nations under your government, of worshiping their national gods.

"Believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets." Paul denied that in becoming a Christian or a Nazarene he had in any way apostatized from the faith of his fathers. Christianity to him was the fulfillment of Judaism.—Schaff.

"Now after many years." It was twenty-one years since his conversion (A. D. 37) and ten years since he started (A. D. 48) on his first missionary journey.

"To bring alms to my nation." The "alms" were, of course, the large sums of money which St. Paul had been collecting since his last visit for the disciples, possibly in part also for those who were not disciples, at Jerusalem (see Rom. 15: 25; 1 Cor. 16: 1-4; 2 Cor. 8: 1-4). How could one who came to help his people, who had spent much time and labor in collecting alms for them, be one to profane the temple they loved?—Peloubet.

"Who ought to have been here." The policy and interest of the Sanhedrim forbade the presence of the Jews from Asia. Any examination of them in a court of law must have proved that they were the authors of the disturbance and that it had its origin in circumstances not connected with Palestine, and beyond the cognizance of Roman law.—Schaff.

"Felix . . . having more perfect knowledge of that way." This verse means that Felix, from his long residence at Cesarea, was too well acquainted with Christianity ("that way") to be deceived by the misrepresentations of the Jews.—Stock.

"Forbid none of his acquaintance to come." So the word of God was not bound. Freely and abundantly did Paul preach the faith in Christ. And this state of things continued for two years. So that we may regard Cesarea as another great working-center of Paul, to be classed with Antioch, Corinth, Ephesus, and afterward Rome.—Butler.

"Temperance." How artfully does St. Paul here insinuate himself into the soul of this great sinner, and shake his conscience at the remembrance of his vices; not by denouncing vengeance against him for his lust and injustice, but by placing in the strongest point of light the opposite virtues; showing their reasonableness in themselves, and their rewards at the Day of Judgment. For he reasoned, not of unrighteousness, not of incontinence, but of righteousness and chastity; and by holding forth a beautiful picture of these virtues, he left it to Felix to form the contrast, and to infer the blackness of his own vices. A masterly stroke! and it effectually succeeded; for as the prisoner spoke the judge trembled.—T. H. Horne.

"Felix trembled." The expression is much stronger. It implies that he was filled with fear. Therefore the rev. version gives "was terrified." Well might such a man be full of fear at the thought, as St. Paul would urge it home, of the judgment after death.—Cambridge Bible.

"Go thy way for this time." Fear sent away not the sin but the preacher. When I have an opportunity. Not a convenient time for repentance, for there is no indication of any penitent feeling in Felix, but an opportunity for further hearing.—Abbott.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.
2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.
3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.
4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.
5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.
7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.
8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.
9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.
10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.
11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.
12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.
13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.
14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.
15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

The Christian Cynosure.

EDITORS.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1885

THE PETITIONS against the Masons profaning the Washington monument are likely to stir the national capital, and we hope also the nation, from center to circumference. "More than one thousand names came in," writes Secretary Stoddard, "after our interview with Secretary Sherman." Our readers shall be rewarded for their prompt activity, and patriotic zeal in circulating the petition, by a full account of the reception of their labors at Washington, and the notices of the press.

BELLEFONTAINE. Logan County, Ohio, has been recently stirred by a hand-bill objecting to a Masonic funeral over the corpse of an old and influential citizen, who unhappily, was a Mason. Citizens there request the senior editor of the Cynosure to come and lay the secret lodge system open before the good people of the town and vicinity. The line of travel will probably be by the Pittsburgh and Fort Wayne road to Forest, Ohio, thence down to Bellefontaine. Will our readers, on or near this route, say at once if they wish to hear our senior editor early in March on the doctrines of our reform?

Mr. Dorcas' letter in this number strikes us as exceedingly able and excellent, both in reference to the American party, past, present and future; and and also respecting a committee of conference on the troubles which arose seven or eight years ago at Wheaton, Ill., now nearly extinguished there, but still disturbing somewhat the peace of the churches abroad. One thing Bro. Dorcas may rest assured of: any compromise which should allow the lodge to find footing in the College or its church there, would be fatal to both.

A "distinguished pastor" informs Prof. Kimball of New Hampshire that the great lecturer Joseph Cook in his Boston lecture, February 9th, "vehemently attacked secret societies." We have read his lectures in the Independent and find no "vehement attack," though he states in his first lecture that the Mormon priesthood is a "secret organization, with an income of $1,000,000 a year;" and in the second lecture, February 9th, he arraigns the atheistic, communistic Internationale as a great secret organization operating against the best interests of society and nearly surrounding the globe, against which inter-national action will be ere long demanded. We have made a strong appeal to Mr. Cook in the article, "Shall we have war?"

Jas. F. Claflin, in the Advance of February 12th, has the ablest article on Socialism, we have seen for a long time. Joseph Cook's lecture on Mormonism, in the same paper, fully sustains the world-wide reputation of this wonderful American.

The Wheaton Committee of Conference referred to by Mr. Dorcas in this number have thus far failed of a full meeting through sickness, snow-blockade, etc. After a friendly conference they have adjourned to meet at the call of Pres't. C. A. Blanchard.

SHALL WE HAVE WAR?

Joseph Cook (Lecture 171st, Feb. 2nd.) tells us that he asked thirty-three leading men at Salt Lake City, a long list of questions; among them, this:

"Will the Mormons fight rather than reform?"

"Yes. Very probably; and in defense, both of polygamy, and the political power of the priesthood."

And again, "Threats of bloody resistance to a Legislative Commission are sometimes made by Mormons of quiet dispositions."

Mr. Cook says, "Since I last stood on this platform I have traveled, not only round the Mormon cancer, but through it. Advancing threads of its vile growth have lately been crossing in Montana, Idaho, Oregon, California, Arizona, and New Mexico. The Mormon cancer is now, at least 1,000 miles broad."

Such are some of Mr. Cook's utterances. Yet as the first of his ten remedies he gives—"The Government of the territory by a Commission."

That is, to deprive all Mormons of civil power, disfranchise and treat them like State's-prison convicts! Yet in this same lecture Mr. Cook says, "My private information is that no Democrat is expected to vote for a Legislative commission because of the Democratic doctrine of State rights."

To recommend governing Mormons by a handful of United States Commissioners, therefore, means war, bloody and terrible. And the conference of thirty-three leading men in Salt Lake City, and the Cullom and Cassidy bills, and all who sympathize with Mr. Cook, agree that nothing short of depriving Mormons of civil rights, will reach and remedy the evil.

Our slavery war cheapened human life, and sunk public morals and the Sabbath full fifty per cent.; and yet there never was a war waged against a more causeless and wicked rebellion, more justifiable on the part of Government or more benign in its results. And never was war so softened by the merciful interposition of the Christian religion. The Mormons are Freemasons and Turks. Like the Mohammedans, they have another professedly inspired book besides the Bible, and another prophet besides Christ. They will fight as Turks fought against the Russians; and they will have friends and sympathizers in every Socialist, Nihilist, Spiritualist, dramshop, lodge, and brothel in the Union.

The Mormons are craftier than the slave holders. They will not bombard our Sumpters and Stars of the West. They will not form a line of battle against the Union. They will rely on bribing, poisoning, stabbing, shooting, and secret assassination. It took about fifteen years to convict and shoot Bishop Lee for the Mountain Meadow massacre; and he would not have been executed if he had not offended Brigham Young. When Jo. and Hiram Smith were shot in Hancock county, Ill., and the Mormons driven into Missouri, some of our best students in Knox College and their professedly Christian parents were on the side of the Mormons. The criminal in the box always has sympathizers in the crowd.

The average of our soldiers in the mountains were meaner than Mormons. They were there to protect emigrants and miners, who used to say they dreaded the soldiers worse than the Indians.

In 1864, some of the troops at Fort Bridger, in a broil about a poor prostituted girl, killed a negro, skinned him, and nailed his skin on the gable end of the soldier's barracks. The same year, a former United States governor of Utah, who was then supreme judge in one of the territories, had several women in his house who had been plural wives of Mormons. We read, "Whoredom and wine, and new wine take away the heart." Hos. 4: 11. And both houses of our Congress suffer from such causes. A popular Senator in Washington, who wielded the secret lodges against St. John and prohibition in Kansas, when mellow with wine boasted that he loved his children who were born out of wedlock as well as those born within it; and Governor Brown of Georgia, in a speech in the Senate a year ago, said it was well known that polygamy was practiced by members of that body without the sanction of Mormon superstition. Vicious men have always existed; but in these cases vice taints and corrupts the fountains of power and administration. And when we remember that the cantons of Switzerland, and the mountaineers of the little principality of Wales have held out against the most fearful odds, wearing out their adversaries by guerrilla warefare, the prospect of subjugating Mormon hate, superstition, and desperation by powder and ball, looks somewhat forlorn.

But the gloom of the case is darkened by the statement that Mormonism would be "as dangerous without polygamy as with it." This is the testimony of the Salt Lake conference of thirty-three. And whoever knew the power of priests to be broken by the bayonet? Cromwell tried the sword against the crosier, and O'Connell boasted that Ireland had waded through three centuries of persecution, and come out with her religion and her priesthood in her heart. The Mormon priesthood is a secret society, says Mr. Cook, with an income of a million a year. One man wields the voting power of a population of 200,000, which may soon be 500,000. "Mormon votes now govern Utah, hold the balance of power in Idaho, and are fast gaining it in Arizona and Nevada." Democrats, as a rule, vote with Mormons; and Republicans are holding State dinners at Washington with seven liquor glasses to each plate! This is the Congress whose "Legislative Commission" is to cure the Mormon cancer by cutting it out with the sword!

But the worst is yet to be told. Joseph Smith was a Freemason, and learned his art of governing men from the lodge. At Nauvoo he received a revelation that Stephen A. Douglas was the "Greatest man that ever lived;" and received from Douglas his first city charter making him law-maker, judge and sheriff of Nauvoo. The Whigs in the Springfield Legislature were mean enough to bid against Douglas for Mormon votes, so Smith's triple iron-bound charter passed without a negative vote, and without a yea or nay recorded! The Nauvoo lodge was also twice given a dispensation by the Grand Lodge of Illinois; and the Endowment House at Salt Lake is that Mormon lodge enlarged, intensified and improved! And to-day, there are not ten ministers of Christ in one thousand who are not terrorized by the lodge.. The lodge-god, who, (Adam Clark says) apes the Almighty, silently says to them, as God says to the sea, Hitherto shalt thou come, and no farther; and here shall your preaching be stayed. A Kansas brother writes that some ministers there, "hint at the lodge."

Now, Mr. Cook calls for "circulars from ecclesiastical bodies," and "vigorous support of Protestant schools;" as further cures for the Mormon cancer. Now, if God were either deaf or blind, churches in which the organized deism of the lodge lies embosomed might hope to hunt Mormonism by their "circulars" and "schools."

But this great and good lecturer knows, as Charlotte Elizabeth has clearly taught, and as the Bible taught her, that "Whatever worship is not paid through Christ is paid to the devil;" and that Freemasonry does not worship Christ: hence, to send Masons to reclaim Mormons is to send foxes to reclaim wolves, or small snakes to catch large ones. This doctrine Mr. Cook will utter in due time, we trust ere long. Till this doctrine is taught the truth is not taught; and without the truth, every attack on Mormonism, is attempting to tame tigers by saying, "Scat!"

There is but one person in this universe who can destroy Mormonism; that person is "The Stronger than the strong man armed." Let this resplendent mind "Come to the help of the Lord" Jesus Christ "against the mighty." As Dr. Cumming says of popery, as apart from "The Holy Catholic Church," Mormonism "is one stupendous demonaical possession." When the church knows this; when she receives "power against the unclean spirits" at Salt Lake, they will be cast out. Never before.

The platform of the American party, borne to God in prayer and to the ballot-box by our votes, is the spear of Ithuriel, whose toueh turned the devil

> "———at the ear of Eve > Squat like a toad," into a blazing demon. Long enough has this foe of God and man, like a queer, harmless toad, sat whispering in the ear of the church and ministry and people of our beloved, threatened and endangered land. Atheism, Spiritualism, Socialism, and Mormonism are all children of this lodge-toad; and not until the huge "Temples" in which this toad burrows are torn down will the land be healed.

THE MONUMENT, THE MASONS, AND THE PROTEST.

The great monument to the memory of Washington was dedicated on Saturday last, by President Arthur. The completion of the loftiest structure in the world, 555 feet above the floor, 597 feet above the surface of the adjacent river, and 45 feet higher than the spires of the cathedral at Cologne, was inspiration enough for an ordinary day. But when the lofty pile is intended to stand while the world stands, as a tribute to the American conception of a noble character, the occasion was one to be experienced but once in the life of a nation. Fisher Ames has said that "Washington changed mankind's ideas of political greatness." That is true of the ideal, but our statesmen and politicians too often make a sorry copy of their model, evidently regarding it as like the monument, too lofty for their emulation. They are more easily attracted by such Masonic fooling and heathen nonsense as was practiced about the base of the lofty pile last Saturday.

Our news columns give in brief the programme of the dedication—what of our protest? The committee requested to act for the protestors, met the Congressional committee on the monument last Wednesday. Secretary J. P. Stoddard, of the N. C. A., accompanied them. Senator Sherman had sent word that the ceremony to be performed by the Masons was not "of dedication, but a brief ceremony of INSPECTION."

The report of that meeting sent by Secretary Stoddard says that after being cordially received, Senator Sherman said substantially:

"The view the Monument Commission took of the dedication services was that it was a national affair and that only representatives of the nation should have part. With this view we declined to give the Freemasons any place on the programme. We considered that they had no more to do with it than any denomination of Christians. This so offended them that they made a fuss about it. They then asked to be allowed to 'inspect' the monument. This ceremony consists in putting their instruments on to see if it is true! or something of that kind. It has nothing to do with the dedication. There was a division in the Commission as to the propriety of it, and it was finally agreed that a few minutes should be allowed for the purpose."

In reply to questions from different gentlemen he said further that the Masons "were given no recognition except to allow them time to inspect" the monument. Only two or three of their leaders would take part and the lodge men were not to come near. They were not to "dedicate" the monument; that was to be done by the President of the United States.

Senator Sherman further said that only one or two of the Congressional committee of seventeen had ever been Masons; that Mr. W. W. Corcoran, first vice-president of the Washington National Monument Society, who was to make some remarks, had been a Freemason, but had left them.

The Masonic ceremony was just thrown in then, it seems, because they whined and begged for it—the very result the Cynosure predicted when the first mention of refusal was made two months ago.

Senator Sherman said, moreover, that he had received already large numbers of remonstrances from individuals, and the matter had been considered by the Commission. The big protest will be preserved in the Library of Congress, and its publication by the daily press of the whole country and by frequent editorial mention show that it was labor well expended. The time from the first was so short that we hardly expected to prevent the Masonic performance; but for a number of reasons the protest was a great success.

The great election conspiracy in Chicago, which was discovered November 18th, and which has been followed up with all the energy and zeal which partizan hate could give, came to an end last Saturday afternoon, by the verdict of the jury in the U. S. Court room. Three of the four men on trial were declared guilty. The case is a remaakable one, and probably has no precedent. After the fraud was made in the returns, ballots and poll books were ordered into court; and to cover up the business, new ballots were put in the box and a new tally sheet made out. Then later, several men were employed to give false testimony, who are now under arrest for perjury. The fraud was attempted to place a Democrat in the State Senate, on whose single vote would turn the election of U. S. Senator. The men convicted of this infamy are not of course the principals in the affair, and their close relation for years with Mayor Harrison and his ambition to go to the Senate are facts that excite much comment.

—Secretary Stoddard was in Washington nearly all last week. He arranged to circulate tracts among the crowd during the Monument ceremonies last Saturday. As we go to press we have not learned where he expects to be during the present week.

—Bro. H. H. Hinman has been trying several doors around about Chicago of late, and finds several of them readily opening to his message for Jesus Christ, the Lord against the lodge, especially among the Swedish churches and the German Lutherans. He spoke on Wednesday evening at Englewood, Ill., a suburb on the south, and a welcome is extended in other parts of the city.

—Bro. George T. Dissette, of Sabetha, Kansas, a seceded Mason, whose faith is proved by his works, has been engaged by the executive committee of the Illinois State Association, and begins work in the southern and central part of the State immediately. Illinois may be congratulated on securing the services of this brother, and we hope the arrangement may be a permanent one.

—At Bro. S. E. Starry's importunate request we very reluctantly remove his name from the lecture list. His reasons so far as we are able to judge are inadequate, and we do not intend the cause shall suffer because his name does not appear in a particular place, since there will be no change in his zeal for the truth and hostility to the lodge curse. His work in New York State is accomplishing great things for the reform. Keep him at work as long as possible, brethren of New York.

—The Weekly Talk of Salem, Ore. quotes from the Benton Leader a significant item. The King's Valley Good Templar's lodge voted to donate the funds on hand to the improvement of the King's Valley cemetery, then disband and forward its charter to J. P. St. John, and carried out the action in good faith. Hail King's Valley lodge! May your action be the example for thousands more until St. John, not Finch, shall be master of all the Good Templar lodges—and in a better sense.

—The secession of M. Andrieux, a high official of Paris, from the Masonic order of that city is almost as much of an event as the renunciation of his lodge oath by the Marquis of Ripon, the Grand Master of England. There is this difference: the English Grand Master was a convert of Rome and could not maintain both religions. The French prefect seems to regard the lodge as a piece of folly and horse-play, and gives no reason for his secession except as we infer that in his official relation he was inclined to keep the oath made to the government, and realizing how often it might conflict with the lodge oath, he threw up the latter. Let us see what will be the outcome of the lodge threat to inflict the penalty.

We wish our readers to remember and reflect, that the Holy Catholic church existed 500 years before the papacy was invented; also that during the dark ages that church preserved the Bible, the doctrine of its inspiration,and above all, the God-head of Christ. Priestism is not a church of Christ.

REFORM NEWS.

FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

THE NEW HAMPSHIRE STATE MEETING—THE GILFORD CHURCH.

NASHUA, Mass., Feb. 13, 1885.

The New Hampshire State Convention is a thing of the past. Failure and victory were happily blended, and disappointments and deliverances followed in such rapid succession that the triumph of faith over sight was marked at every step of the proceedings. The array of brilliant talent announced, found employment elsewhere, leaving the war in the hands of the secretaries of the New Hampshire and the National Christian Associations. Only Bro. Reed, of Ryegate, Vt., among the speakers announced appeared on the ground, and he was summoned by a dispatch to return and bury one of the elders of his church before he entered the convention. But let it be recorded to the praise of a covenant-keeping God and the lasting honor of the church of Jesus Christ in Gilford Village, that the devout men and women, by their hearty co-operation, prayers, and presence infused such vitality and spirituality into the meetings that the absentees were scarcely noticed. The devotional meetings were especially blessed, from thirty to fifty taking part. The secretary will make an official report of the proceedings in due time.

PUTNAM, Conn., Feb. 14.—Hoping to encourage others to go and do likewise, I wish to add to my note of the New Hampshire Convention a brief sketch. Some twelve or fifteen years ago when the church where the convention met, was under the watch-care of Elder S. C. Kimball, he took a bold stand against secret societies and other popular evils, fortifying his position with facts and arguments, and lead the faithful flock triumphantly through the struggle that followed. Prominent and paying members withdrew, predicting disaster, and denouncing the pastor as a disturber in Zion, etc, Giving little heed to their accusers, the church maintained their radical position and God owned them in a gracious revival. The work begun with the children and youth, and continued until many were added to the church. The opposition sneered, and said it was a baby affair, etc, but all, young or old, who gave evidence of the "new birth" and would publicly "renounce the world, the flesh, and the devil," were welcomed to the fold. After four or five years' labor the pastor accepted a call to another field, and after an absence of ten years he returned to find the church standing firm, and the boys and girls of ten years ago, the pillars and supporters of this testifying body of Christ. Some things have been demonstrated in the history of the church at Gilford Village.

1. An attempt to purify a corrupt church will create disturbance.

2. Honest efforts will succeed if persisted in, and urged in the spirit of the Master and on Bible grounds.

3. He that keepeth Israel will not suffer the candlestick of the faithful to be removed.

4. Jesus accepts children, and the church, in her deep solicitude for the future, may well adopt the petition, "Give me children else I die."

5. The Church of Christ at Gilford Village is a confirmation of God's faithfulness and should be a reproof to every time-serving pastor or compromising church in New Hampshire.

May God's blessing abide upon this people, and greatly strengthen their hearts and hands. It is through such bodies of believers and doers of the Word that help is coming from God to overthrow the giant evils in the land. J. P. STODDARD.

NEW HAMPSHIRE CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE EIGHTH ANNUAL MEETING.

This meeting was held at Gilford Village, Feb. 10, 11 and 12. The weather was severe, the attendance from abroad was not large, and we were greatly disappointed by several of our leading speakers being detained at home by sickness, yet the Lord graciously made up every loss and the meetings were glorious beyond description.

Deacon Heman Hunter was chosen temporary moderator. Committee on resolutions: Deacon Simon Rowe, C. Burt Hoit and Kimball Cole. Committee on permanent organization: Geo. Crosby, S. C. Kimball and Mercy Watson. Treasurer's report was read and adopted.

Resolutions against secret societies, especially discountenancing the dynamiters, were read and adopted. The following officers were chosen for the ensuing year:

President, A. H Lamprey of Laconia; Secretary, S. C. Kimball, of Newmarket; Treasurer, Geo. Crosby, of Gilford Village

Vice Presidents: Belknap Co., Elder J. G. Smith; Hillsboro Co., Rev. S. L. Gerould; Carroll Co., B. M. Mason, Esq.; Cheshire Co., Deacon F. S. Wood; Grafton Co., Prof. J. K. Lord; Rockingham Co, Rev. E. C. Cogswell; Stafford Co, Deacon Moses Pierce; Sullivan Co, C. W. J Fletcher; Merrimack, J. F. French.

Executive Committee: A. H. Lamprey, S. C. Kimball, George Crosby, Dea. S. Rowe, A. H. Brown.

Delegates to the National Convention: Dea. Simon Rowe and Kimball Cole.

Alternates: Edgar Wylie and L. C. Kimball.

The report of S. C. Kimball, Home Missionary for the State during the past year, was given, narrating in brief his labors among the poor and sick living remote from Christian privileges; the introduction of hundreds of copies of Christian and reform papers where none were before taken; interviews with pastors in reference to the havoc in our churches made by secret societies; addresses and sermons on Christian and reform topics with statistics proving that labor in the Lord is not in vain.

The following resolutions were adopted:

1. That Elder S. C. Kimball be appointed Home Missionary and Colporteur for the State of New Hampshire.

2 That it shall be the duty of our Home Missionary to preach and lecture, as the Lord may open the way, to distribute tracts, sell books and solicit subscriptions for the Christian Cynosure and Christian Witness.

3. That our Home Missionary shall receive for his services $26 per month, to be pledged in advance.

IN MEMORIAM.

4. WHEREAS, Since our last annual meeting our beloved brother, Elder C. M. Emery, late pastor of the church at Gilford Village, has passed from earthly labors, therefore,

Resolved, That we hereby place on record our high appreciation of his Christian character and of his faithful work as a minister of the Gospel, and extend to his afflicted companion and parents our most hearty and prayerful sympathy.

SECRET SOCIETIES.

5. Resolved, That in our judgment no greater evil now afflicts the American people and no greater danger imperils American institutions than secret societies, inasmuch as they furnish to the evil elements of society a centralized, powerful and dangerous organization with which to prosecute evil designs; that by means of secret combinations the liquor traffic, Mormonism, corrupt political rings, infidel sentiments and socialism are bolstered up, and dynamite plots of murder and vandalism executed. We, therefore, renewedly pledge ourselves to truthfully expose and earnestly withstand all secret societies.

6. Resolved, That we commend the Christian Cynosure and the Christian Witness to the favor of all Christian people, as faithful and able advocates of Gospel truth.

7. Resolved, That we express our sincere thanks to the church of Gilford Village for the use of their house of worship, and to the citizens of the place for their cordial hospitality in entertaining the delegates of the convention.

8. That we hereby cordially thank Rev. J. P. Stoddard, General Agent of the N. C. A., for his wise counsel and efficient services in our convention.

Before the adoption of the resolution in memory of Rev. C. M. Emery, appropriate remarks were made by Rev. J. P. Stoddard, Dea. Simon Rowe, Hon. John J. Morrill and S. C. Kimball. Three lectures were given by Bro. Stoddard, one on Temperance and two on Freemasonry. Our brother was not left in his own strength and wisdom but was permitted the grand privilege of smiting Baal with the rod of the Lord in his hand. It was not so much a hard fought battle as a jubilee of victory.

The glory of the Lord filled the house during the meetings and the experience of the people verified the promises of the Scripture. Many well authenticated cases of tobacco-cleansing, faith-healing and complete deliverance from lodge bondage were reported in person and by letter. Sermons were preached by Elders J. G. Smith, J. P. Stoddard and S. C. Kimball, the Lord bearing witness by his Spirit. The meetings of prayer and conference were blessed beyond words to express. The church was refreshed, and the unsaved were drawn toward Christ whose infinite love and saving power were so manifestly displayed. To God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit be all the praise. S. C. KIMBALL, Sec'y, N. H. C. A.

THE HOME.

JESUS OF NAZARETH.

If Jesus came to earth again,
And walked and talked in field and street,
Who would not leave his human pain
Low at those heavenly feet;

And leave the loom, and leave the lute,
And leave the volume on the shelf,
To follow him, unquestioning, mute,
If 'twere the Lord himself!

How many a brow with care o'erworn,
How many a heart with grief o'erladen,
How many a youth with love forlorn,
How many a mourning maiden,

Would leave the baffling earthly prize
Which fails the earthly weak endeavor,
To gaze into those holy eyes,
And drink content forever!

If I might crouch within the fold
Of that white robe (a wounded bird),
The face that Mary saw behold,
And hear the words she heard,

I would not ask one word of all
That now my nature yearns to know,
The legend of the ancient Fall,
The source of human woe.

What hopes in other worlds may hide,
What griefs yet unexpressed in this;
How fares the spirit within the wide,
Waste track of that abyss.

And I—where'er he went—would go,
Nor question where the path might lead.
Enough to know that here below
I walked with God indeed.

His sheep along the cool, the shade,
By the still watercourse he leads;
His lambs upon his breast are laid,
His hungry ones he feeds.

If this be thus, O Lord of mine,
In absence is thy love forgot?
And must I, where I walk, repine
Because I see thee not?

Oh, nearer to me in the dark
Of life's low hours one moment stand,
And give me keener eyes to mark,
The moving of thy hand.

HONOR THE HOLY GHOST.

The Holy Spirit is becoming the central thought of religious inquiry. This is not only true of professional theologians, but it is manifest among all classes of the Christian community. It is the outgrowth of a universally felt spiritual want.

The Cross of Christ constituted the central fact of theological discussion during the past three quarters of a century. And in the exitement of controversy concerning Christ's Divine Person and redemptive mission, the Divine Person of the Holy Spirit was almost forgotten. That was a conflict about the fact of a Divine atonement. There is coming a fierce conflict about the application of that atonement. In the past, the extent of the provision of the atonement was a chief point of controversy. In the coming years, the extent of the application of the atonement will be the principal point of contention.

In the christological controversy of the past, Christ triumphed gloriously. And now the discomfited forces of darkness are renewing the battle on a different field. Around the Third Person in the Trinity will converge the conflict of opinions for coming years. The theology of the past generation is preeminently a theology of Jesus Christ. That of the coming generation will be preeminently a theology of the Holy Ghost.

The discovery and utilization of force marks the progress of knowledge in all departments of philosophy. But nowhere is there so pronounced a desire for force as in the church of Christ. Spiritual force, prophesied by the prodigious discoveries and applications of physical forces, is the proclaimed want of the present age. This spiritual want comes of Divine activity in humanity. Human history seems coming to its climax. The natural merges into the supernatural; the human into the Divine. This is in harmony with the Divine Scriptures, prophetical and apocalyptical. This overwhelming spiritual force which is to transform and spiritualize the race until the new heavens and the new earth appear (2 Pet. 3: 13; Rev. 21: 1) is a personal force. This personality is omnipresent, omniscient, omnipotent, DIVINE. This is the HOLY GHOST. This is God's final and fullest revelation of himself. Christ Jesus is "God manifested in the flesh." The Holy Ghost is God manifest in spirit. By that, God dwelt with us—"Emanuel;" by this, God, dwells in us, "a habitation of God through the Spirit."

That all believers might experience this Divine inbeing, Christ commanded them to receive, obey, and adore the Holy Ghost equally with the Father and with himself (Matt. 28: 19). It is only by enthroning the Holy Ghost distinctly, inseperably and equally with the Father and the Son that the believer can experience the fullness of saving grace. It is only here that the full "light of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (2 Cor. 4: 6) will shine forth to conquer a gainsaying world. Only in this dispensation of the Holy Ghost is it that, "we all with unveiled face reflecting as a mirror the glory of the Lord, are transformed into the same image from glory to glory, even as from the Lord the Spirit."—2 Cor. 3: 18, [R. V.]

This latter-day glory was remarkably manifested a century ago, especially on the Wesleyan Reformation. In that and on the Great Awakening under Jonathan Edwards, the glory of the Triune God was seen. The commission of Christ met a complete acceptance. The Holy Ghost was accepted, honored and worshiped equally with the Father and the Son. Then the searching law laid open the exceeding sinfulness of sin, and prepared the way for the inviting Promise and the healing Spirit.

But a different theology supervened. The Divine law, under guise of loving goodness, was put in the back-ground and ignored altogether. Under such a mutilated Gospel, the promises of God, were rendered of little effect, and now the great majority of Christians are, like the converts of Ephesus, ignorant of the Holy Ghost as a Divine Person to be received, trusted, and obeyed like Christ the Son of God. Even some spiritual leaders of the people, ignorant of any specific consecration to the Holy Ghost, need to learn "which be the first principles of the oracles of God." While the preacher is "unskilful in the word of righteousness" (Heb. 5: 13.), how shall the people be edified? If the spiritual guides of the peo- are but "babes," it impossible for them to bring the the people to "full age," "to discern both good and evil."

But we rejoice in the present rapid recurrence to acknowledged standards and fundamental principles. —India Methodist Watchman.

AN EXAMPLE OF ENTIRE CONSECRATION.

It would be surprising if the Moody and Sankey mission did not furnish material sufficient to form a deeply interesting story. If, however, any one had ventured to weave into a religious novel only the few incidents here related, the result would have been regarded as highly colored, if not altogether incredible. During the visit of the American evangelists to this country ten years since, an event occurred which has borne, and is still bearing fruit. A Mr. Studd attended the services at Camberwell, and such was the influence exerted upon him by Mr. Moody's addresses, that he became an entirely changed individual. From a sporting man he suddenly became an enthusiastic Christian worker. Mr. Studd, who is now deceased, began by reforming his own household. He disposed of his hunters and dogs, and his country seat henceforth became a centre of missionary efforts for the district. At that time his two sons, then unknow to fame, were quietly pursuing their studies at Eton. The influence of the changed aspect of their home told upon the lads. Passing to Cambridge, the young Studds came to be regarded as among the most famous cricketers of the present generation, one of them being the captain of the University eleven. The recent visit of Messrs. Moody and Sankey to London had the effect of bringing the brothers Studd prominently forward as religious workers, along with other undergraduates who had been alike influenced by Mr. Moody. The young Studds took an active part in the various missions, and their enthusiasm was not allowed to evaporate with the departure of the American evangelists. One of the brothers, Mr. C. T. Studd, has decided to become a missionary in China, paying his own expenses; and in addition, so it is rumored, placing a considerable sum of money at the disposal of the society under whose auspices he will labor. Mr. J. K. Studd, the brother, is entering upon mission work in East London, in which he will be assisted by one of Lady Beauchamp's daughters, whom he is about to marry—the fairest of the two young sisters whose sweet voices were heard throughout the nine months' services conducted by Messrs. Moody and Sankey. A son of Lady Beauchamp, who was chief steward at several of the missions, following Mr. Studd's example, will also devote his life to mission work in far-off China. Not contented with quietly betaking themselves to heathen lands to work for the Master they decided to leave all and follow, these young men are now striving to enlist recruits under the foreign mission banner. They recently visited Cambridge, and have kindled such missionary enthusiasm in the hearts of their fellow-students that something like thirty of their number have decided to proceed to the foreign field. Encouraged by the success of their mission to Cambridge, Messrs. Studd and Beauchamp are now going through Scotland to plead the claims of the heathen world, in the hope of inducing young men north of the Tweed to cast in their lot with the ambassadors of the Cross, who forsake home and friends to carry the message of salvation to the millions who are living in darkness.—Christian World, London.

A RELIGION OF LOSS.

Our Saviour was noticeably frank with his disciples in fortelling them of much evil that would befall them for his sake. "Count the cost," said he. "Look the matter in the face. I would not hide from you any unwelcome thing that may happen to you for my sake. Old neighbors and friends may turn their backs upon you. The very nearest may prove themselves the farthest off. If you are a husband, even your wife may turn against you. If you are a parent, one of the foremost blows may come from a son or daughter. If you are a child, even your father, and the mother that bore you, may open the home-door and bid you begone! And if you go up to the synagogue, your loved house of early worship, where Moses and the prophets, who speak of me, are read, you will be in danger of being cast out. Yes, the time cometh when he that killeth you will think that he doeth God service."

Thus honest and frank was our Saviour with his disciples. He was far from deceiving them; but told them frankly that his religion might prove to them a very perilous one, a losing one in which they might lose even their lives.

Would this frighten and alienate them? Well, they might as well know all the possibilities first as last. And he also might as well know first as last, who was going to bear the test, so that if any of them turned back, he could fill up the ranks with others before he departed. But all stood the test, and kept on following him.

And the most staggering feature of his discipleship he put first. "You may lose your life," said he, well knowing that if they stood this test, they would stand any and all others. For, "Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath, will he give for his life."

When Archbishop Cranmer saw that his whole body was soon to be burned, it was comparatively a small loss to him to burn his right hand as he did. After a man is beheaded, it is no matter how many of his fingers or toes he may lose, or how soon his entire body may be quartered and hung up on the city gates or walls, as in old times. Hence our Lord was pleased to hold up before his disciples the possibility of even a life-loss for his sake and the Gospel's. And in so doing he in effect asked the question, "Do you assume the risk?" And every one of the twelve (even admitting Judas) virtually answered, "I assume it."

And these answering words were by no means empty and vain. They stood the test of time. And when one after another of them, in after years that came rapidly on, was asked which he would give up, "Christ or life?" the invariable and prompt answer was, "life." And so Peter and Andrew went to the cross, Paul to the Roman block, James parried not Herod's sword, Ignatious faced the lions, and Polycarp yielded himself to the flames.

Thus our Lord put the most valuable thing first; and it would have been but trifling for him to ask them after that if they were willing, for his sake, to lose health, wealth, character, or liberty; since the less does not contain the greater, but the greater contains the less. And so he held up to them the possibility of his religion being to them a losing religion.

And in answer to the question, "How is it now? Is Christ's religion a religion of possible personal loss yet?" I can only say that our Saviour's admonitory words have never been recalled. There they stand as of old. And numerous modern instances of their fulfillment rise up on every hand. There are the massacred missionaries, Munson and Lyman, who went to Australasia for Christ's sake and the Gospel's. On the fever coast of Africa, or under the hot suns of India many a missionary for Christ's sake and the Gospel's loses his health forever. And as to the money losses, in this view of the matter they are more than can be numbered. And the more they multiply, the faster the millennium comes on. The setting up of a selfish, non-self-denying, non-self-sacrificing, non-philanthropic, covetous religion would have been not more beneath the dignity of our Lord of glory, than it would have been remote from the demands of a lost and needy world. —American Messenger.

LIVES OF CELEBRATED MEN.

BERNARD DE PALISSY.

Towards the close of the sixteenth century, King Henry III. visited, in a prison of his capitol, a noble old man of whose life, and discoveries France to-day is proud, and urged him to abjure his religion, that his life might be saved. He said, "I am compelled to deliver you into the hands of your enemies, and to-morrow you will be burned unless you are converted." How little the great men of that period knew of the true nature of conversion; they did not dream that it was beyond the power of man, because they regarded it as a mere profession of the acceptance of certain dogmas. But Palissy, then nearly eighty years of age, nobly replied: "I am ready to give up the remainder of my life for the honor of God; you have told me several times that you pity me, and now in my turn, I pity you who have used the words, 'I am compelled.' It is not spoken like a king, sire; and they are words which neither you, nor the Guises, nor the people, can ever make me utter. I can die." Noble words from the lips of the old Huguenot, Palissy the potter.

What inspired him with such heroism? How did he come to be in prison and to be visited by a king? We shall see.

Bernard de Palissy was born at La Chapell Biron, in 1510, just ten years before Luther burned the Pope's bull at Wittenburg, and some sixty-two years before the Massacre of St. Bartholomew; accordingly, by the time Palissy became of age and had finished his apprenticeship to the business of glazing, the country was ablaze with discussions on questions of religion. In 1539, when he was twenty-nine years of age, it was made a crime, punishable with death, in France, to read the Bible. But even such an edict had no terror for a mind so independent and so inquiring as was his. At the completion of his apprenticeship he undertook a journey through the country adjacent to the Pyrenees and through the provinces of the lower Rhine, sustaining himself by engaging in his trade and painting on glass. In his journeying he met many warm adherents of the Reformed Faith, learned to read the newly printed Bible, and, better still, to love its precepts; and, on his return to Saintes, he commenced the work of an exhorter, in accordance with the good example, counsel and doctrine of the worthy Philebert Hamelin, a a noble laborer, who was afterward condemned as a heretic and put to death at Bordeaux. Following his example, Palissy associated with him some six others, and alternately they read and expounded the Scriptures to as many as they could assemble from Sabbath to Sabbath, in their private meetings, for they dared not to meet openly. In these meetings Palissy was much comforted and encouraged, and prepared for his patient labor during the week. At that period he especially needed encouragement, for some years previously, having seen a beautiful enameled cup, he was seized with a desire to obtain the secret of the art. This was one of the lost arts; no one knew then how to make them. At great cost of time and labor, which he could ill afford, and amid the jeers and scoffs of his neighbors, and, worse still, the reproaches of his wife and children, he patiently experimented until the secret was obtained. These years were years of poverty, sorrow and distress for himself and family, and he needed the comforts of religion to sustain him until his triumph came, and earthly glory and wealth were showered upon him. After his success he removed to Paris and built his furnace where the palace of the Tuilleries now stands, and was honored by the friendship of nobles and princes. But while he was struggling for his secret, he sought the consolations which he needed in communion with his Saviour; nor was he content to enjoy these blessings for himself—he sought to bring others to a knowledge of the same soul sustaining and saving truths, and so he formed the First Reformed Church of Saintes. Few and despised were these numbers at the first, and rumor charged them with all kinds of wickedness, but their upright lives at length impressed themselves on their neighbors, and the Catholics soon began to say to their priests, "See these ministers of the new religion; they make prayers, they lead a holy life, why cannot you do the like! and the result was that even these began to favor and practice the precepts of Protestantism. Palissy, years after, described it as follows: "In those days might be seen, on Sundays, bands of work people, walking abroad in the meadows, the groves, and the fields, singing psalms and spiritual songs, or reading to and instructing one another. There might also be seen girls and maidens, seated in groups in the gardens and pleasant places, singing songs on sacred themes; or boys, accompanied by their teachers, the effects of whose instruction had already been so salutary, that these young people not only exhibited a manly bearing, but a manful steadfastness of conduct. Indeed, these various influences, working one with another, had already effected so much good, that not only had the habits and modes of life of the people been reformed, but their very countenances themselves seemed to be changed and improved." But the new religion, as it was called, was making similar progress in other portions of France, and the leaders of the Romish church took the alarm. Pope Pius IV., aided by Philip II., of Spain, urged the French authorities to interfere, to stay the progress of that Gospel which was leading men to trust in the Lord Jesus Christ and lead holy lives—it was heresy, it would destroy the church, and then, in turn, destroy the state. Such arguments prevailed with the civil authorities, and in 1559, a royal edict was published, declaring the crime of heresy punishable by death, and forbidding the judges to remit or mitigate the penalty. For a period Palissy concealed himself, in the hope that the storm of wrath would soon pass over—a storm which he described as "if hell itself had broken loose and the raging devils had entered into and taken possession of the town of Saintes." But he was too prominent a man and too devoted to the cause of the Reformation to escape for any length of time; accordingly, he was finally apprehended, and hurried by night to Bordeaux, to be tried for the crime of heresy, as his teacher Hamelin had been. No doubt he, too, would have been condemned and burned, only that the Duke of Montmorency was in urgent want of enameled tiles for his castle-floor, and Palissy was the only man in France capable of producing them. The skill that God had given him was the means of his deliverance. It was also the means of his advancement to the favor of Catherine de Medicis, one of the most cunning and unprincipled of women; but neither her favors nor her frowns could shake Palissy's faith in his religion or lead him to dissemble. It had sustained him in the days of adversity and he adhered to it in his prosperity. And such was his faithfulness that he was after awhile again apprehended, thrown into the Bastile, where, as we have already said, he was visited by Henry III., to whom he boldly declared, that, though he could not give up his religion, he "knew how to die." He was not, however, burned, but allowed to remain in his cell until death came to his release. Thus one of France's noblest martyrs witnessed for the truths of Christianity.

A few years after, the celebrated Edict of Nantes, giving liberty to the Protestants in France, was signed, but Palissy did not need it, he was where he understood the meaning of this expression to the fullest extent: "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."—Christian Press.

FIVE KINDS OF PENNIES.

A boy who had a pocket full of pennies dropped one into the missionary box, laughing as he did so. He had no thought in his heart about Jesus or the heathen. Was his penny not as light as tin?

Another boy put in a penny, and looked around to see if anybody was praising him. His was a brass penny,—not the gift of a lowly heart, but of a proud spirit.

A third boy gave a penny, saying to himself, "I suppose I must because others do." That was an iron penny. It was the gift of a cold selfish heart.

As a fourth boy dropped his penny into the box, he shed a tear, and his heart said, "Poor heathen! I am sorry they are so poor, so ignorant, so miserable." That was a silver penny—the gift of a heart full of pity.

But there was one scholar who gave his saying, "For thy sake, Lord Jesus! Oh, that the heathen may hear of thee, the Saviour of mankind." That was a golden penny, because it was the gift of faith and love.—Selected.

TEMPERANCE.

STOP THE FEARFUL WASTE.

England's bill for drink last year was $628,386,375, for 1,032,142,158 gallons, enough to fill a floating dock for the largest man-of-war, a mile long, a mile wide, and 35 feet deep. New York city supported 10,075 liquor saloons, that furnished 42,612 out of the 67,135 cases of arrest by the police court. There were only 2,915 butcher shops, 1,055 bakeries, 4,127 groceries—in all, 7,197 places for the sale of food. When will the community arouse to the conception of the fearful havoc the liquor traffic is making, undermining the best interests of society. Never was food so low in all the markets of the world; never was there such a profusion of the products of varied industries. The great question of business managers is where to look for increased demand for what they so abundantly supply. Can any one doubt that the wisest thing that could be done would be not so much opening up of Central Africa as a new market for our products and manufactories, but the stoppage of the waste that liquor makes, utilizing the money and the labor of the millions now wasting in drink, wages that might be productive of increased comfort and increased demand for more of the comforts and conveniences of life?—The Friend.

THE GROWTH OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

The theory that lager and light wines are to supplant distilled beverages is not confirmed by the statistics of the Internal Revenue Office, for the consumption of the latter as well as of the former increased during 1884. The amount, in gallons, of distilled and malt drinks consumed in 1883 and 1884 was as follows:

	1883.	1884.	Increase.
Distilled drinks	72,980,248	76,179,204	3,198,956
Malt drinks	552,257,185	591,035,928	38,778,743

The facts here presented can be used very effectively by the advocates of total abstinence, and they can fortify their argument with the assertions of eminent medical men that the habitual use of malt beverages, as well as distilled, is injurious. Of the advantages to health, pocket, and morals of total abstinence there can be no doubt, but even the advocates of moderation as distinguished from prohibition recognize the need of exertions to check the progress of the dreadful traffic in drink. In the old world, as well as the new, the march of the destroyer has created alarm, and the desire for temperance reform has perhaps never before prevailed throughout the world as it does at the present time. The movement now in progress in New York needs the aid of every citizen, and there is a chance for reformers of all shades of opinion to do effective work in the cause.—New York Mail and Express.

The Chicago Herald, with a great army of figures, goes on to show that the prohibition movement now in progress is a menace to thousands of people and millions of money. If successful, the Herald says, it would wipe out property and fortunes as remorselessly as war. The Herald shows by its figures that 147,000 men are engaged in the liquor traffic, and the number is swelled to 200,000 by counting those dependent upon the trade for a living. All this is true so far as it goes, but why does the Herald pretend to ignore the other side of the question; or is it so ignorant that it is not aware of the facts that those who buy and use liquor can present. The Herald makes out 147,000 liquor dealers. Well, suppose we take a basis of twenty men who drink liquor at their places; that makes 2,940,000 whisky drinkers, and the basis is a low one. Two per cent. of these 2,940,000 whisky drinkers are chronic drunkards. Does the Herald pretend to believe that the fortunes liquor dealers would lose by prohibition would equal the fortunes wrecked by these drunkards in an average life of thirty years? Does the Herald believe the loss of the fortunes of liquor dealers can compensate for the loss of the souls of these drunkards, the misery of their families, the wretchedness and crime the liquor sold by these dealers is responsible for?—Detroit Evening Journal.

In Great Britain, according to the N. Y, Sun, 990,000,000 gallons of beer are annually brewed; in Germany, 900,000,000, in the United States 600,000,000; in France, 157,500,000: in Austria and Hungary, 280,000,000; in Belgium, 210,250,000; in Holland, 34,000,000; in Russia, 8,000,000; in Switzerland, 13,500,000; in Denmark, 28,000,000; in Sweden, 21,000,000; in Italy, 4,000,000. THE CHURCHES.

—Prof. L. N. Stratton, of the Wheaton Theological Seminary, lately preached at the dedication of a new church at West Union, Iowa, of which Rev. Homer Hull is pastor.

—A new church is to be dedicated at Humbolt, Richardson county, Nebraska, next Sabbath. Rev. R. Loggan, the State agent for Kansas, is expected to preach.

—The Wesleyan Methodist church of Hillsboro, Ohio, is the scene of one of the greatest revivals of religion known in that city for years. The Wesleyans, A. M. E. and Baptist congregations, meet together at the Wesleyan Methodist church. The meeting grew out of a previous effort which resolved itself into a union effort held here by Elder S. M. Smothers, of Richmond, Ind. Since February 1st there have been some twenty-five conversions.

—A wonderful revival is in progress in the Beaver Falls, Pa., Presbyterian church, Rev. J. D. Moorhead, pastor. On a recent Sunday 105 persons were received into the church.

—The Summit Street United Brethren church, Dayton, Ohio, is enjoying a powerful revival, such as has never been known in that part of the city. Over 100 have experienced conversion.

—As a result of Father Chiniquy's labors among the French Catholics in this city, in connection with pastor Seguin's French Mission, twenty-five families have signed a paper accepting the Protestant faith and renouncing Romanism. Meetings will be resumed at Maskell Hall on Des Plaines street next week. The French Mission is much straitened for lack of funds, but seems to be continually growing in influence and numbers. Any aid sent to Rev. P. A. Seguin, No. 44 Blue Island Avenue, will be thankfully acknowledged.

—The Wesleyan Methodists of London, England, have undertaken to raise $100,000 for their mission work in the neglected portions of that city.

—The son of Merle D'Aubigne, the historian of the Reformation, and who bears his father's name, is engaged in missionary work in the Savoy.

—The rate of increase of communicants in the foreign mission fields in 1881–2 was more than six times that in Christendom, and in 1882–3 more than nine times.

—Among the one hundred and fifty Roman Catholics who have united with the Presbyterian church in Valparaiso, South America, about one-third have said that the turning-point in their religious experience took place while witnessing the celebration of the Lord's Supper.

—For several weeks evangelical services have been held in the chapel of Tremont Temple, Boston, every afternoon and evening, excepting Saturday, conducted by A. B. Earle, the evangelist. He has large congregations and many conversions are reported.

—The Russian government prohibited the erection of a Luther monument at Riga, but it paid $450,000 towards the building of an "orthodox" cathedral in that Lutheran city.

—It is not uncommon for public men in England to preach. Earl Cairns, the late Lord Chancellor, often addresses the people. The Last Lord Mayor of London occupied the pulpit in different chapels. A sermon was recently preached in the Solway Street Baptist chapel, in Liverpool, by Mr. W. S. Caine, M. P., one of the Lords of the Admiralty.

—A meeting of the Norwegian, Norwegian Danish, Norwegian Augustana, and Hangean Synods was opened in Chicago, January 28th and closed February 7th. The object of the meeting was to promote more unity of faith and co-operation in church work. This is the third meeting of these Synods for the same purpose of late years, and while it is not expected that they will unite organically at present, they think they are moving in the right direction. The sessions of this meeting were largely attended both by delegates and members of the Chicago churches.

—A dispatch from Wheeling, W. Va., says: A revival of unprecedented depth and fervency is prevailing in the Ohio Valley from this city south. In many towns business is almost suspended. The country press this week brings reports of revivals in over one hundred places. At Gallipolis, Ohio, nearly 2,000 in a population of 8,000 have been converted. A great revival is prevailing at Barnesville, Ohio. Four hundred conversions are reported in ten days. It is estimated that in West Virginia and Eastern Ohio there have been from eight to twelve thousand conversions in the past seven weeks.

—A revival is in progress at Shenandoah, Iowa, and over fifty have professed conversion. At Hampton, in the same State, one hundred have already signified their determination to live for Christ.

—Rev. Geo. C. Needham, formerly pastor of Chicago Avenue church, is holding evangelistic service in Richmond, Va., with the best of results. The meetings are a continuation of the convention work inaugurated there by Mr. Moody a few weeks ago.

—The missionaries of the London Missionary Society in the Loyalty Islands have been ordered by the French authorities, to cease teaching in their own language, as they wish the natives to receive instruction in French, and, of course, in the Romish faith. A fortnight was allowed in which to consider the matter, and the missionaries stood firm, saying that they would obey no government agent in religious matters.

—Chili has discarded the Roman Catholic religion as the religion of the State, and has announced perfect liberty to all forms of Christian faith. The oath of the President, at his accession to office no longer binds him to the support of the Roman Apostolic Catholic religion.

—Mr. Moody closed a series of five meetings, last Sabbath evening at Richmond, Ind., with a mass-meeting at the Orthodox Friends' large meeting-house. Both the men's and women's sides were thrown together, and with their large galleries were filled at every meeting. L. W. Munhall, the Indianapolis evangelist, assisted. The Friends objected to the introduction of instrumental music into their edifice, and while Moody was disappointed and expressed his surprise at the prohibition, he gracefully yielded to their wishes.

—William Taylor has received a letter from President Arthur to the chiefs of the countries through which he will pass on his journey across Africa, to be used by him as a passport and fraternal greeting to the rulers of various cities. Mr. Taylor proposes to plant about twenty mission stations through the belt of rich country across the continent south of the Congo. He hopes to secure forty missionaries, twenty of whom will enter Africa with him from the Atlantic Coast, and twenty with Dr. Summers from the Indian Ocean, the two parties meeting in the interior.

—It is said that Mohammedanism is making rapid progress among African tribes, and binding in a great confederation scattered peoples who have heretofore had no common sympathies. It is even declared that the operations of Europeans in the Congo region result in the spread of Islam, by the employment of great numbers of Houssas. These are among the most skillful of the Africans. Their cotton cloths and leather goods are widely sold, and it is said that the International Association is employing them largely to till the soil and show the natives how men of their own color can work and thrive; but as they are devoted Mohammedans they act as missionaries of their faith. Arab traders are influential in many regions in leading the tribes to espouse the religion of their prophet. The powerful Mussulman Society known as the Senousians has turned many tribes to Islam. This fraternity, the most successful of all the Mohammedan propagandists, has its monasteries, and wields a great power from Morocco to Mozambique. It is said to have made ferocious bigots of thousands of blacks, who formerly welcomed intercourse with the white Christians. The growth of Mohammedanism in Africa is hindering not only the spread of Christianity, but also the advance of commerce.

—At the last meeting of the Board of Managers of the American Bible Society it was announced that an efficient agent has been sent to New Orleans, with an ample supply of the Scriptures to meet the necessities of persons visiting the Cotton Centennial Exposition. Interesting letters were read from the United States Consul at La Guayra, with thanks for a grant of Scriptures; from Cuba, reporting a prosperous beginning of work at Nuevita; from Honolulu, announcing the completion of the translation of the New Testament for the Marshall Islanders; from Mexico, reporting for 1884, a distribution of 13,187 volumes of Scripture; from Japan, speaking of a general depression in all branches of trade, while religious work is the only thing that prospers; from China, forwarding the Gospels and Acts in Mandarin and English; from St. Petersburg, reporting what had been done in Siberia and the Caucasus; from Brazil, with reports of colporteurs employed in that empire, and of others sent to Bolivia last summer. The total receipts for January were $42,535, and 75,146 volumes were issued from the Bible House during the month.

THE SECRET EMPIRE.

—The Catholic Order of Foresters numbers twenty-two lodges in Chicago at the present time.

—The Oriental Consistory, 33 degree Masons, calling themselves "Sublime Princes of the Royal Secret," lately presented their retiring commander-in chief a purse of $200 in gold.

—Dr. T. D. Fitch of this city entered the army in 1861 or 1862 as a surgeon. He was a skilful practitioner, and rose to the rank of brigade surgeon. After the war he settled in Chicago and maintained a successful practice for some twenty years, and appeared to be generally in good health, especially when parading the streets with Knight Templars. A paralytic stroke two or three years ago affected his health and business, and lately by special act of Congress he was placed on the pension roll.

—The firing of the Hocking Valley coal mines, the stopping of railroad traffic in Indiana, the cutting of telephone lines on Staten Island, the blowing up of Garry's store in New York with dynamite (said to be on account of the discharge of an employe), and many other acts of violence all point to one result, namely, that the business of the country is not to be managed by those who employ labor, but by the trades unions of the workers, be they laborers, clerks or artisans; and that not by virtue of any law, human or divine, but by the will of the trades union, an irresponsible body, usually managed by the most dangerous men in it. From the violence permitted by trades unions to the sacking of cities and robbery of stores and banks is an easy step; and unless the wiser and better elements of society take the necessary precautions in great cities, there may be fearful scenes witnessed the very first dull time that occurs.—N. Y. Witness.

—The fight between the secret order of Orangemen and the Romanists in Newfoundland has been raging bitterly for a year. Its progress is thus recounted by the Independent:

In Newfoundland there are about 100,000 Protestants and 65,000 Catholics. Till about a year ago perfect harmony prevailed; but now there is a very bitter feeling between the two parties. Last year a procession of Orangemen was attacked by a body of 300 armed Catholics, and five Orangemen were killed and fifteen wounded This created intense excitement all over the island. The Orange society quadrupled its membership. Social and commercial intercourse ceased between Catholics and Protestants, the bitterest feeling prevailed, and both sides armed themselves. This refers especially to the Harbor Grace district. Nineteen Catholics were arrested and committed for the massacre on five separate indictments. They were brought to St. John's for trial. The jury was a purly Catholic one. The prisoners were acquitted on the first indictment. This intensified the bitter feeling existing among Protestants, and the Orangemen adopted the motto: "Justice if possible; vengeance at any cost." Protestants demand that the murderers of the five men shall be punished. The better class of Catholics agree to the reasonableness of that demand. But the lower element regard the prisoners as heroes and defenders of their church and faith. The Orangemen declare if they are finally acquitted, very little time will elapse before summary vengeance overtakes them. Of course the Catholics threaten retaliation. Thus, while the people are practically in a state of civil war, and only prevented from open hostilities by the presence of a British gun-boat, many Americans are seeking other fields for investment of their brains and their money, and Newfoundland is putting itself half a century in the rear. For some time to come political parties will be divided on the question of orange and green. Another collision between the parties is only a matter of time. In the language of a Catholic dignitary: "The present state of affairs cannot last very long, and things will be a great deal worse before they are better."

OBITUARY.

Died, at the village of Hardwick, Vt., at 2 o'clock on the morning of January 5, 1885, MRS. FANNY RIPLEY, wife of Eliab Ripley. Having lived for many years at the old homestead with her father and step-mother, they removed to Vermont. Mr. Ripley died at the early age of 52 years, at Turingsville Barre. He was from old Plymouth, Mass.

Mrs. Ripley, after a long life, reaching over 90 years, gently passed away, so gently that loving friends sitting near hardly realized when the moment of departure came. She was the daughter of Samuel Clark and Sarah Wheeler, who were united in marriage at Charleston, Mass., just before the Revolutionary War, in which her father took a conspicuous part, holding a lieutenant's commission and acting as commissary of subsistance. She was a member of a large family, being the seventh in number, and was born in Boston. The family after her birth removed to Plainfield, Sullivan county, New Hampshire, where four sisters were added to their number; first a pair of twins, still living in the State of Michigan, having passed the ripe age of 85 in October last—Mrs. Betsey Wood, widow of Jacob P. Wood, now residing with her youngest daughter, at Grand Ledge, Mich., and Mrs. Lucy Wixom, left a widow by her first husband, Constant Wood, remarried Abijah Wixom, who died in 1850; next Prudence, died some years ago, her husband, John Ross, surviving at quite an advanced age; next the youngest daughter, Harriet, married Jacob Rich, whom she survives at the age of 78, residing at Long Meadow, Mass.—three widowed sisters, being the sole survivors of a family of five sons and seven daughters. Mrs. Ripley has lived many years with her son-in-law, W. O. Clement, experiencing the loving care of two daughters, Mrs. Fanny J. Clement and Mrs. Amelia P. Shedd, who with their children survive to mourn her irreparable loss. Not only her immediate friends, but those removed by distance, yet who knew her inestimable worth, deeply feel that loss.

THE BEREA EVANGELIST

—AIMS TO ADVOCATE—

CHRISTIANITY

—AND TO—

HELP BREAK DOWN EVERYTHING

THAT HINDERS ITS SPREAD.

—)oo(—

It teaches that men need to be converted to a person—the personal Christ—and not simply to a system of truth; and that there must be implanted in them a divine life, as well as a correct belief.

The EVANGELIST seeks to show that the division of Christians into parties—denominations, sects—is a great wrong, and a very serious obstacle to the advancement of the Redeemer's Kingdom, and it seeks to show Christians and Christian churches how they may be one in Christ, in "the Apostles' fellowship," and to persuade and help them thus to unite.

The EVANGELIST also opposes Intemperance, Secret Societies, Worldliness, and the spirit of Caste, and aims to "war a good warfare" against all wrong.

In thus opposing evil, the EVANGELIST carefully endeavors to avoid harsh speaking, believing that it is as much duty to speak truth kindly as it is to speak it at all.

Published twice a month. Only 50 cents a year.

Prescott's History.

HISTORY of the REIGN of FERDINAND and ISABELLA, the Catholic. By WILLIAM H. PRESCOTT, Corresponding Member of the French Institute. Member of the Royal Academy of History at Madrid, etc.

Illustrated Library Edition, in two volumes, small octavo, including portrait and other illustrations. Long Primer type, fine heavy paper, fine cloth, gilt tops. Price per set, $2.00, postage 28 cts.

Popular Edition, from the same plates as the above, the two volumes bound in one, uniform in size and equivalent in quality to the Caxton editions of Irving, etc. Price, $1.25, postage 15 cts.

"At the price, considering the quality of the work, the books are marvelously cheap."—Morning Herald, Rochester, N. Y.

"Previous editions of this work have exhausted its praises and the volumes are too well-known to need an extended review."—Pioneer Press, St. Paul, Minn.

"His work is as entertaining as the tales of Sir Walter Scott. It is the marvelous cheapness of publication and quality of the mechanical work that attract notice."—The Midland, St. Louis, Mo.

"Mr. Prescott's work is one of the most successful historical productions of our time. In a word, he has, in every respect, made a most valuable addition to our historical literature."—Edinburgh Review.

"Prescott's works themselves need no commendation now. This is one of the most romantic of histories. This edition is compact, in large type, neatly bound, and cheap."—Presbyterian Journal, Philadelphia, Pa.

"One of the very finest histories of modern times, written by an author of rare felicity of diction, fervor of imagination, accuracy of statement, and exquisite beauty of style. Every one who reads at all should read Prescott."—Presbyterian, Philadelphia, Pa.

"We cannot dismiss the book without observing that it is one of the most pleasing as well as most valuable contributions that have been made to modern history; that it is the only one that gives us a faithful and sufficient picture of a period so momentous as the latter half of the fifteenth century."—London Athenæum.

"The history needs no words of praise; it has long been considered a standard history of the times of which the author writes. How Mr. Alden can print and bind such books at such a price is a wonder. If this does not induce hundreds to read it now who never read it before, it will be a wonder."—Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.

"This standard work of the celebrated historian is too well-known to need any word of commendation here. Mr. Alden has rendered an important service to the reading public in bringing it out in its present form. The edition is really an excellent one. It has numerous illustrations, and all the author's valuable notes. It is fit to appear in any library. And yet these two handsome volumes are sold at the exceedingly low price of $2. Surely the publisher cannot fail to find an extensive sale for this valuable work at such a low price."—Methodist Recorder, Pittsburgh, Pa.

FARM NOTES.

EGGS.

The annual supply of eggs in the United States is placed at 500,000,000 million dozen, which at 16 cents a dozen (the price at which foreign eggs can be laid down in New York), would be worth $80,000,000. Official reports say the daily receipts of domestic eggs at New York is 4,000 barrels of seventy dozen each, or 280,000 dozen in all. The receipts of eggs at that port since September 1 last were 27,948 cases, of 50 dozen to the case, or 1,397,400 dozen. Estimating the period since September at 120 days would make the daily arrival of foreign eggs at New York, 10,000 dozen, in round numbers, which added to the daily arrival of domestic eggs, makes a total of 290,000 dozen arriving in New York daily. The wholesale produce dealers in New York say that there is no means by which the number of eggs arriving there can be officially ascertained, but they consider it safe to say that the arrivals of domestic eggs are fully half of the total arrivals, say 140,000 dozen a day. No duty is imposed on the imported eggs.

NEW USE FOR SAFE DEPOSIT VAULTS.

A well-known New York seed firm has on deposit in the Mercantile Safe Deposit Company's vaults four hundred pounds of Henderson's snowball cauliflower seed, which at the selling price of $100 per pound shows the value of this seed to be $40,000. Not only is this plan cheaper than insurance, but what is of more importance if this seed should be destroyed by fire the quantity necessary for their trade could not be replaced at any price in time for the spring sales. When it is considered that four hundred pounds of cauliflower seed will under favorable conditions produce nearly thirteen million plants, which when headed for market and sold at even eight cents per head, will aggregate the sum of three-quarters of a million dollars, the value this vegetable has attained in this country, where twenty-five years ago it was almost unknown, becomes readily apparent.

—Horses that have a rackful of hay before them all the time will grow poor, when, if fed a limited quantity, with some grain, they will become fat. The rack filled with hay becomes offensive from the horse's breath, and the animal must be partly starved before he will eat it.

—A Wisconsin farmer stoutly maintains that he prevents the ravages of the beetles in his petatoes by planting one or two flaxseed in each hill. He says the bugs will shun the flax every time, and that he has grown potatoes in this way for ten years and secured good crops when others failed.

—At a recent trial of sheaf-binders at Shrewsbury, Eng., under the auspices of the Royal Agricultural Society, the English machines gained a complete victory over those of American make. The latter have held the field for the last quarter of a century, but John Bull has at last learned how to make a good machine.

—In the care of fowls no one thing is more important than system. There should be a daily routine. It must be somebody's business to attend to the fowls punctually at just about the same time every day—just as much as it is essential to the well-being of a well ordered family to have the meals at regular hours, the washing done on Monday, the ironing on Tuesday, the baking on Wednesday, the sweeping on Friday, etc. It is just as essential as it is to groom the horses, feed and water all around, regularly and daily, week in and week out.

SEEDS FOR THE CHILDREN.—Joseph Harris one of the editors of the American Agriculturist, offers to send any boy or girl under fifteen years of age the best of garden seeds free by mail at 25 per cent less than regular rates. This is not a humbug. It is a genuine offer. Send for his seed catalogue of 1885 with directions for cultivation. It is sent free to all applicants, and is well worth reading. Send at once. Address, Joseph Harris, Moreton Farm, Rochester, N. Y.

OR THE POWER OF THE SECRET EMPIRE. A faithful representation in story of the evil influence of Freemasonry, by E. E. FLAGG, author of "Little People," "A Sunny Life," etc. This is a thrillingly interesting story, accurately true to life because mainly a narration of historical facts. 384 pages. In cloth, $1; per doz., $9. Paper, 50c; per doz., $4.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"There is no important history extant but has connected with it numerous other histories of which it was the initial point, or the dominating influence. The abduction and murder of Morgan set ten thousand secret springs in motion, as the surrender of the charters of so many lodges at that time, and the severing of their connection with the order of some forty thousand of its members indicated. This story is one of these histories, and is a collection of facts woven into a story. It cannot fail to be read with interest."—Free Methodist, Chicago.

"The republication of the Reform Story which run through the columns of the Cynosure for nearly a year is at last completed, and the book so anxiously expected by thousands of our readers has come from the press of Ezra A. Cook. The book is finely bound and fairly introduces the reader to the treasures within. The publisher has made occasional selections from Masonic works to verify the statements of the text; these make a helpful addition for some who can afford no more complete an armory of this kind."—Christian Cynosure.

"In an incidental way the story tells much about the manner of conducting lodges and much about the spirit and methods of Masonry. The story covers the period of the abduction and murdering of William Morgan. The strategic position from which the author writes put a charm in the book, while it gives a good opportunity to show the workings of the order. We wish all the people would read it."—Telescope.

"It is one of the most fascinating narratives we ever read and teaches its lesson in a manner not soon to be forgotten. It is evidently written for the heart and its words go to the heart. It is singularly free from wild denunciation. Those who are interested in the secret society question would do well to form the acquaintance of this interesting work."—Lutheran Standard, Columbus, O.

"The exciting scenes of the fall of 1826, at Batavia, N. Y., when Wm. Morgan was murdered by Masonry, are woven into the story so as to give the truth of History a setting of attractiveness. The forty chapters of the volume are soon compassed by the eager reader who begins the volume. This volume ought to be read and will be sought as its merits become known."—United Brethren in Christ.

"The story is intensely interesting and the author has succeeded in weaving into it a great deal of information in regard to this mysterious order, which is certainly startling if true, and he gives what seems to be undoubted evidence to prove his assertions. The book is one which should be read by both Masons and Antimasons."—Wayne Co. Herald.

"Our Anti-secret society friends are certainly entitled to great credit for their persistence in their efforts to expose and root out secretism. The object of the writer of this story is to present in its true light the crafty, unscrupulous and exceedingly hurtful influence of Masonry, the parent of all the orders."—Reformed Presbyterian and Covenanter.

"A WEEKLY SHOWER OF REFRESHING."

Such is the language of a minister in writing of the

CHRISTIAN NATION

New York.

—)o-o(—

Read some of the many high opinions of the CHRISTIAN NATION expressed by people and papers:

The True Radical Ring.

I like your paper. It has the true radical ring, and is growing better every week.

A Weekly Treat.

Allow me to congratulate you on the appearance and make-up of your paper. The matter is very good, and in fact the whole is par excellence. I hope you may receive many thousands of subscribers. S. O. LOWRY.

In the Front Rank.

I congratulate you most heartily upon the success which has thus far attended your enterprise, and wish you the largest measure of success in the future. This undoubtedly you will have, and simply because of the merits of your paper, which already holds its place among our best religious Journals, and has put itself abreast of the advanced movemeuts in journalism. (REV.) J. F. CARSON.

Hold the Fort for Prohibition.

I am very much pleased with your paper. It is not a yearling, but I hope that it may be, like England's queen of old, hale and hearty at sixty—that it may live to see this nation a Christian Nation indeed and in truth. Hold the fort for Prohibition! Some of us have had to pass through the fire of persecution because we dared to vote our sentiments on that question, and your paper has been a weekly shower of refreshing to us. May it prove a blessing in this, and be a great power in the work of overturning the greatest evil that ever cursed our nation, and which does more than any other agent in hindering us from becoming a Christian Nation. (REV.) A. H. ORR.

IN THE COILS;

The Coming Conflict.

A NEW AND STRANGE STORY BASED ON STARTLING FACTS, VIVIDLY PORTRAYING A MYSTERIOUS AND DANGEROUS POWER AT WORK IN THE GOVERNMENT, THE CHURCH, AND THE HOME.

"All will agree that this is a powerfully written story."—Evangelist, (Chicago, Ills.)

"A book which we trust may have a wide circulation."—National Baptist, (Philadelphia.)

"So intensely interesting did I find it that it was hard to pause until the last sentence was read. This work places the author high among the writers of fiction."—W. W. Barr, D. D. in Christian Instructor, (Philadelphia.)

"Unless we are greatly mistaken, the work will do more to awaken the American church and people to the evils of Freemasonry than any other book recently published."—Evangelical Repository.

"The book will create a sensation in Masonic circles, and evoke criticism of a most relentless character. The courage of the author in attacking such a rock-rooted bulwark as Freemasonry is something to admire, Fanatic though he be."—Nebraska Watchman.

"Light is needed on this subject and needed badly, and we welcome this contribution to the literature of anti-secretism, and cordially commend it to the favorable attention of our readers."—United Presbyterian, (Pittsburgh.)

"A charming work, fit to be classed with 'Uncle Tom's Cabin;' it is indeed less a work of fiction. The volume is as valuable as a work of reference as it is agreeable, truthful and useful. Our young folks will not leave the book, if they begin it, till they 'see how it turns out.'"—Cynosure, (Chicago, Ills.)

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt. William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribes his NAME to the letter, but ATTACHES HIS AFFIDAVIT to it.

In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of "secret societies."

The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

IN BRIEF.

The north half of the Masonic Temple at Cincinnati was consumed by fire a few days since. Enoch Carson's famous Masonic library and the paraphernalia of the Scottish Rite fraternity being included in the loss.

The Interior says that recently a discriminating little four-year-old boy gravely left his class and walked up to the chorister of a Sunday-school, and whispered in his ear: "You make too much noise; I can't hear the singing." That will do to pass around for the benefit of choirs in general.

A few days ago as workmen were removing ice from Ober & Co.'s ice-house in Dresden. Me., they found a large frog between two blocks of ice that were frozen together solid, and had been in the house two years. Heavy blows were required to separate the blocks, when on being released his frogship stretched himself a few times to get limbered up, and then hopped away as lively as ever, apparently none the worse for his frigid imprisonment.—Boston Journal.

A long forgotten community has lately been discovered in Siberia. In the course of a prolonged inspection of his province the governor of Irkutsk came across a town called Ilim, with 500 inhabitants, 150 houses, and four ancient churches, with remarkable relics of Cossock times. It is still under the Republican rule of a vetche, or public assembly, convocked by a bell, as in old Novgorod the Great, although the new municipal institutions were supposed to have been applied to that part of the empire ten years ago. Not one of the inhabitants can read or write.—Boston Journal.

Two strangers passing Rowland Hill's church one day entered, walked up the aisle, and finding no seat, stood for a while and listened to the sermon. Presently they turned to walk out. Before they reached the door the preacher said: "But I will tell you a story." This, of course, arrested the strangers and they paused, turned again and listened. "Once there was a man," said the preacher, "who said that if he had all the axes in the world made into one great axe, and all the trees in the world made into one tree and he could wield the axe and cut down the tree he would make it into one great whip to thrash those ungodly men who turn their backs on the Gospel and stop to hear a story."—The Argosy.

We have over three times (50,017) as many postoffices as England, which comes second with 14,918. Our total receipts last year were $46,404,960, and the English were $49,480,265, Our expenditure was $43,338,127, and the British $36,044,765. The letters which passed through the English mails numbered 1,322,086,900. That is an average of thirty-seven to each person. The British number 35,000,000 of population, the Americans, 55,000,000; but our 7,000,000 of blacks use the mails very little. The American avcrage of letters and postal cards is 22, German 15, French 14. The English postoffice cares for the peoples savings. The total deposits now are $208,844,040. Within ten years the deposits and depositors have doubled. Within only four years the depositors have increased by a million, to 6,645,040, and of this million one quarter were young children.—Chicago Tribune.

THE DEACON LETTUCE.—Readers of Mr. Harris' "Walks and Talks on the Farm," in the American Agriculturist, know "The Deacon." He is a veritable deacon, living on the adjoining farm. He had a variety of lettuce, originating in the neighborhood, which had been greatly improved by years of careful selection, and which Mr. Harris has sent out to his customers. Dr. Sturtevant of the New York Experimcnt Station speaks very highly of it in his report. Rose Terry Cooke, the well-known authorcss, writes: "I found the Deacon Lettuce last year the best I had ever grown, and I have had all the best kinds sent out by the seedsmen in New York and Philadelphia." It costs only five cents a packet. Mr. Harris is a large seed grower. His catalogue for 1885 will be sent free to applicants. Address, Joseph Harris, Rochester, N. Y.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

WASHINGTON.

A final decision has been rendered granting money-order fees to postmasters as perquisites. The case arose from the contest in the Bloomington (Ill.) post-office, where the assistant postmaster, who attended to the money-order department, claimed the fees should be given to him or turned into the national treasury. The decision adds millions to the cost of maintaining the mail service.

The completion of the Washington monument was the occasion of an imposing demonstration on Saturday. The ceremonies opened with an address by Senator Sherman. The Hon. W. W. Corcoran made the formal presentation, and President Arthur the speech of acceptance. After a brief performance by the Masonic Grand Master, a procession was formed, with Gen. Sheridan as chief marshal, and reviewed by the President. Both branches of Congress assembled in the the House of Representatives. The diplomatic corps and many distinguished visitors were also present. After a brief address by Senator Edmunds, Representative John D Long read the address of the day, written by the Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, of Massachusetts. The ceremonies concluded with an address by the Hon. John W. Daniel, of Virginia.

COUNTRY.

The Chicago city council has authorized the expenditure of $15,000 in clearing away the snow, to avert a possible flood.

It is estimated that there were last week 25,000 freight cars snowed up at Chicago within a radius of twenty-five miles.

The snowstorm in Pennsylvania last week Monday was the heaviest for years, twelve to fourteen inches falling in the northern section. An unusually high wind packed the snow into huge drifts and some trains had to be shoveled out. Railroads are badly blockaded and country roads are impassable.

The injury to fruit trees in Michigan by intense cold has been so severe that but half a crop is anticipated next season.

The resolution for submitting a prohibitive amendment to the people has passed both houses of the Michigan Legislature.

The resolution proposing to submit a proposition for an amendment to the constitution to license the liquor traffic in Ohio was defeated in the House of Representatives Wednesday by five votes.

Fearing damage to the Pennsylvania railroad bridge at Columbia, Pa., when the ice breaks up in the Susquehanna river, officials of the road decided to blast the ice from the immediate vicinity of the bridge, when it was discovered that the river was in many places frozen to the bottom, thus rendering the plan impracticable. Great damage along the river from flood is apprehended.

Knights of Labor of Jackson, Mich., have petitioned the Legislature to memoralize Congress to make of Alaska a penal colony.

At Macksburg, Ohio, new petroleum wells are being opened daily. Three, averaging 75 barrels each, were struck on Thursday.

Twelve bodies of the victims of the snow-slide at Alta, Utah, were brought to Salt Lake Tuesday night. Four of those reported dead were rescued alive, after being buried for hours. By other avalanches in the vicinity six persons have perished.

An explosion in a gas well at Ashtabula, Ohio, Thursday killed one man and fatally injured three others.

Valuable silver discoveries have been made in Ritchie county, West Virginia, and it is asserted that the Baltimore and Ohio railroad ballasted its track for miles through the mountains with silver quartz.

The Lake Erie & Western road has ordered a full train of coal to be delivered gratuitously to the needy families along the line of their roads in Indiana. The rigors of the present winter have justified such a movement and reflects much credit on the management of the road.

A distressing accident occurred at the Chicago Union Stock Yards, Friday, resulting in the death of two men and the injury of four more. Two locomotives were running in the same direction, the first one emitting such a dense smoke as to obscure the second. A gang of men clearing the snow from the track got out of the way of the first enging, but resumed work just in time to be run down by the other.

Near North Vernon, Ind., Friday morning the sleeper of an Ohio & Mississippi passenger train was thrown down an embankment, resulting in the loss of three lives, and three others being slightly injured.

The Marvin Safe Company's factory at New York was burned Thursday night, tenements adjoining being badly damaged and the occupants driven half naked into the streets. The loss is $230,000 and 250 men are rendered idle.

Joseph Haberecker, of Muncy Valley, Pa., his wife and three children went riding in a large two-horse sleigh; the horses took fright, the sleigh was overturned, and the occupants dragged 500 feet, when the horses fell. The father's neck was broken; one child had both legs cut off, and died. The wife and the remaining children are thought to be fatally injured.

Five persons lost their lives by a collision Thursday night on the Virginia Midland railroad, near Four Mile, Va. The contents of the express safe, between $75,000 and $150,000, were destroyed, and thirteen through registered mail pouches, 180 sacks of ordinary mail matter, and 180 registered letters were consumed in the fire, besides thirty cars and coaches. Money and valuables to an unknown amount were in the pouches. The railway company's loss is $25,000.

Shortly after 5 o'clock Thursday evening fire broke out in the fine six-story and basement structure known as the Grannis Building, Nos. 111 to 117 Dearborn street, Chicago, and in a short time completely destroyed the interior, leaving nothing but the walls. The loss is estimated at $200,000 to $250,000, for the most part covered by insurance.

All buildings on the north side of Chestnut street between Second and Letitia, Philadelphia, save the Carr Exchange Bank, were destroyed by fire Thursday, the front of one of the structures caving and killing a man and a horse. The total loss will probably exceed $200,000.

A dispatch from Whatcom, Wash. Ter., says the new residence of John H. Stenger, President of the Washington Colony, was blown to atoms, Tuesday night, by dynamite. The loss is $3,000, but no lives were lost. The cause is supposed to be the outcome of land troubles which have been brewing for two years.

George Q. Cannon, ex-congressional delegate from Utah, interviewed when in Chicago, declared that the operation of the Edmunds law amounts to persecution and business in the territory is demoralized.

FOREIGN.

Great anxiety is felt in England as to General Buller's position at the Abu Klea wells. Special dispatches state he is hemmed in by hordes of Arabs, and apparently the only alternative before him is slaughter or starvation. The War office admits his critical condition, but express the belief that he will be able to retreat to Gakdul with most of his troops. A successful skirmish on Saturday drove the Arabs back to the Nile, and aroused some hope that Buller would extricate himself. Gen. Wolseley has about 7,000 in his different detatchments.

The speeches at the opening session of the British Parliament made clear only that the government was in accord with Gordon, and that it was resolved to make a stand in the Soudan against the Mahdi. Mr. Gladstone took the position that the government had done all it could to rescue Gordon, and intimated that the relief expedition would have succeeded had not Khartoum been captured through treachery.

A dispatch from Korti says General Buller, who began his retreat from Gubat several days ago, was compelled to halt at Abu Klea wells and intrench his troops in position there, in order to safely defend himself against El Mahdi's men, who are gathering in large numbers on his line of retreat. Grave fears are entertained that Buller may meet the fate of Gordon unless speedily succored. General Buller has erected three new forts, and is preparing for a siege. He has dispatched a messenger to General Wolseley describing the situation as critical, and stating that El Mahdi is advancing upon his position with an immense force.

There is a dynamite scare at Frankfort, Stuttgart and Mayence, owing to anarchist letters and placards circulated broadcast threatening explosions. The military and police are taking precautions night and day.

There being fears that the Mormons of Utah are negotiating for the purchase of land in Sonora for the purpose of transferring their entire colony there, the Mexican government has asked for information from the government of Sonora. Public opinion in Mexico is strongly against allowing the Mormons lodgment there.

PETITION TO JOSEPH COOK.

WHEREAS, Many believe, with Charles G. Finney, that Freemasonry and kindred secret orders are unchristian in character; with Dr. Chas. Jewett, that they delay the triumph of prohibition; with President John Q. Adams and Wendell Phillips, that they engender class hostility, subvert justice in the courts and promote favoritism in politics; and,

WHEREAS, The Boston Monday Lectureship, conducted by Joseph Cook, affords an opportunity specially favorable to discuss the effect of any great movement upon civil government and the Christian religion;

THEREFORE, The undersigned, ministers, pastors and Christian businesss men unite in respectfully requesting Mr. Joseph Cook to devote one or more of his lectures to this subject.

NAME. POST OFFICE. OCCUPATION.

The above petition has been adopted by Sen. Pomeroy, Prof. Bailey, and Secretary Stoddard, in conference at Washington, D. C. It has been sent to fifty College Presidents to be signed and returned by their faculties. Senator Pomeroy hopes Senator Sherman and other men prominent in the National Congress will sign it, and Mr. Stoddard will, in person, present it to prominent clergymen in Philadelphia and New York.

The object of the request and the wide circulation is to shield Mr. Cook from the poisoned arrows of the lodge, which has adopted the policy of keeping the truth from reaching the Christian public. Ten or twenty thousand names of leading clergymen and cevilians will shelter Mr. Cook from the lodge-cry of "Fanatic," raised against Christ and his apostles; and against every one since who boldly resists the claim of Satan to be the "god of this world." Of course we have not consulted Mr. Cook about this measure, but if the names are forthcoming, we have little doubt that he will promptly comply with the request, as he makes no secret of his opinions against the lodge-system and has already in his "Prelude," February 9, shown that the secret lodge, packed in degrees, and sworn to secrecy and assassination constitutes one compact anti-social conspiracy against God and goodness.

"Once more into the breach, good friends; once more!"

Fifteen thousand eight hundred and forty-six names were gathered and sent in against the monument-defilers, in a trifle over two days' time! This is nothing less than the beginning of the end of our great struggle. If Mr. Cook speaks for us, the Independent, Advance and Religious Telescope will send his arguments to the extremities of 38 United States and ten territories, and this will unmuzzle ten thousand pulpits and presses which are now silent or speak only by hints. Thousands of good men by the enforced silence of press and pulpit, now regard the lodge as only one evil among many, instead of being the mother evil of the age. For instance, they are ignorant:

1. That the lodge organized the rebellion.
2. That it owns a hundred millions worth of temples, in which the leading minds of infidelity and assassination meet, and consult and plan.
3. That the money, in fabulous amounts, which supports this system is drawn largely from Masons who seldom or never attend the lodge, but pay and contribute to keep in its favor and avoid its teeth.

Now then let every reader of this writing, especially every volunteer agent for the country against defilers of the Washington monument, either copy or cut out the request to Mr. Cook, and begin at once to collect the names of ministers, pastors, and Christian business men, and report progress and send the names to 221 W. Madison street, Chicago, and to 215 4½ street, N. W., Washington, D. C.

THE WASHINGTON MOVEMENT now fast begins to reveal its importance It was suggested by Mr. Hinman, executed by Secretary Stoddard, and is now ably manned by Prof. Bailey. The origination of the monument movement is wholly due to Mr. Kellogg, who is now out of the Cynosure office by the (supposed) dying bed of a dear and beloved child. The American should have noticed the origin of this national movement which it has handled so admirably. "Honor to whom honor."

IT IS SIGNIFICANT that temperance papers like the Boston Law and Order, the Wooster, O., Herald, with a large number of similar able sheets, may be read through from week to week, and never meet a notice of a Good Templars', or other secret temperance order. Are the temperance lodges "possuming?" Or are they dying out? Whatever the cause, the fact indicates that the prohibition movement may safely drop them and go on its way in the open sun-light.

MISS E. E. FLAGG'S serial has been repeatedly commended, but none, or next to no editorial notice has been taken of her Bible lessons for Sabbath schools. We read these through last Sabbath with intense delight. We resolved to lay down no Cynosure hereafter, till we had walked with her through these "Bible lessons," where ease, and elegance of diction, blend with learning and research, so that one feels, who has passed through them like returning from a ramble by the brook-side, through meadow, orchard and forest with a hat full of berries and other ripe fruits.

THE Itinerant is the third name adopted by a paper issued in Harrisburg, Pa. The United Brethren Tribune was the first name adopted and the paper was endorsed by a nullification party which held a convention in Dayton and voted to remove this Harrisburg paper to Dayton. This did not frighten the old and venerated Telescope out of the printing house. The nullifiers grew unpopular, and the name of the paper was changed to Observer, which was again exchanged for Itinerant. This paper of March 2 says: "The Itinerant is about entering upon an aggressive campaign in the interest of the United Brethren church work in the East." It adds: "We know that there are those who do not desire to see this enterprise go forward." The Cynosure is among the number, for these among other reasons:

1. The Itinerant, this number of it, has no allusion to the approaching General Conference, at Fostoria, Ohio; nor indeed to any other church work but that of dividing the U. B. church into East and West sections, giving no reason for the same derived from the word of God.

2. Its silence on the question which distracts and threatens the division of that excellent body of saints, is ominous. All the lodge-god asks is silence. We shall be pleasantly disappointed if the supporters of the Itinerant do not vote to open their communion to Freemasons.

3. Such silence is fearful. When the lodge worships had permeated and corrupted Jerusalem (Ezek. Ch. 9), God sent a man through the city to "set a mark upon the foreheads of the men that sigh and cry for all the abominations that are done in the midst thereof," and the rest were to be utterly slain. "Old and young, both maids and little children and women." Their guilt was that they knew these abominations and said nothing about them. Now the Itinerant is among United Brethren. It knows that the fathers of that church abhorred secret lodge-worships, and forbad them, as personal insults to Christ, and worships of his rival, Satan. The Itinerant has no mark on its forehead, and is therefore doomed by the teaching of this holy prophet.

WHENCE ALL THIS COMMOTION?

BY REV. D. SIMON.

Men's hearts are failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth. There is distress of nations, with perplexity. Kings and emperors and great men are terror-stricken. They are called rulers, but are in fact slaves. The world has been turned upside down. And lo! these troubles are but begun. So far it has only been a still small voice. The storm is approaching. The sun is yet occasionally seen through the scattered clouds. Those black clouds in the distance, are, however, approaching nearer and nearer, the flashes of lightning are becoming brighter and brighter, the peals of thunder are becoming louder and louder, and before long the most frightful storm the earth ever witnessed, will be upon us.

We are not prophesying as by inspiration, but judging from present indications. We are expressing in words what, at least the intelligent people of our land and Europe, have felt for a number of years. What is coming upon us, we see as though it were upon us already. When the trees begin to bend to and fro, the storm is not far away. It is almost here.

The present state of things, especially in America and Europe, is such that the better class of people are painfully anxious in regard to future developments. The instruments of death are in the hands of the rabble. They are determined to rule or ruin. They are so many that when they shall once break out in full force the land will be darkened because of the multitude. And woe unto those who will then offer resistance! The rulers shall then be subjects, the masters shall be servants, the rich shall be without possessions and the highly honored shall be brought low.

To this end the communistic element of society is now laboring, and for this purpose the labor-unions everywhere exist. What is said of man in general in Romans 3 is intensely true respecting those now battling with the rulers and law-abiding citizens: "Their throat is an open sepulchre; with their tongues they have used deceit; the poison of asps is under their lips: whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness: their feet are swift to shed blood: destruction and misery are in their ways: and the way of peace have they not known: there is no fear of God before their eyes."

We ask, who are these people so much dreaded? They are not an enemy dwelling in some foreign country, and that would needs attack us as a nation from without. The enemy is in our midst. Your next door neighbor, perhaps a member of your own household, may belong to the number. They are called secretists, or to be more definite, Nihilists, Communists, Socialists, and recently dynamiters.

We enter further into the matter and ask, What gave rise to such wicked combinations of men? The Nihilist would annihilate the powers that be, and why? The Communist and Socialist would bring down to a level with themselves not only those in authority over them, but also all others upon whom the Giver of all good may have bestowed a greater abundanee of earthly possessions, or a greater share of honor. And why would they bring them down? What has called into exercise the wiekedness of their sinful natures? What has aggravated them for years, and thus cultivated the evil begun? What has been fanning the spark of revenge into a flame now ready to destroy?

We answer in words that may not be misunderstood, The rulers, the masters, the eapitalists, have brought about this state of things by their own tyranny, oppression and injustice. And to them we would address the words of Dr. Martin Luther of the 10th eentury, who thus sharply reproved the rulers of Swabia at the time of the sedition raised among the peasants, in the year 1524:

"No one on earth is to be blamed for these troubles and seditious than you princes and lords, but in particular, you blind bishops and crazy priests and monks who are yet, to-day, obdurate, and will not cease to rave against the holy Gospel, although you know that it is right, and you cannot refute it. Besides this, all that you do in the government of the world, is, that you carry ou extortion and taxation for the benefit of your own luxury and pride, until the poor, the eommon man, neither can nor will endure it any longer.

"The sword is upon your neeks, and yet you imagine that you are so firmly seated in the saddle that no one shall be able to lift you out. Sueh security and obdurate presumption will break your necks; you will see it. I have frequently deelared unto you before this, that you should take warning from the 107th Psalm, verse 40: 'He poureth contempt on prinees.' You are striving for it, and want to reeeive a blow upon your heads, there is no use in warning and admonishing you. Be it so then, sinee you have brought on this wrath of God, it shall undoubtedly also come upon you, if you do not change your course in time. . . . . For this you shall know, my lords, that God so manages affairs, that your raving neither can, nor will, nor should, be endured. You must change your course, and yield to God's Word. If you will not do so in a cheerful and friendly way, you will be compelled to do so by force and destruction. Should these peasants not accomplish it others must do it, and if you should kill them all you would not be victorious. God will raise up others. He has determined to destroy you and he will destroy you. It is not the peasants who are contending against you, it is God himself; he is contending against you with his just retribution for your madness. . . . . Now then, my lords, if you will yet receive advice, for God's sake, make way somewhat for their wrath. A load of hay should avoid a drunkard's way, how much more should not you give up your raving and tyrannical obstinacy, and conduct yourselves with reason towards the peasants whether they are mad or in error. Do not begin to quarrel with them, for there is no telling where the end would be. Use kindness first, for you cannot tell what God is about to do, lest a spark should begin to burn and set all Germany on fire, and such a fire that no one shall be able to quench it. Our sins have come before God, in consequence of which we are to fear this wrath, even if we but heard the rustling of a leaf, and why not when such a crowd is in commotion?

"The government was not instituted that the rulers might be benefited and live in luxury at the expense of the subjects, but that they may seek the public welfare. This extortion cannot be endured very long; of what benefit would it be to the peasants if their land would produce as many florins as straws and grains, when the rulers only take the more that they may increase their luxury, and waste the goods like chaff, in dress, in bauqueting, drinking, building, and the like! This pomp must be put away, these expenses stopped, if the poor are to receive anything. . . . My lords, you have the Scriptures and history against you. See how the tyrants were punished. Even the heathen poets write that tyrants seldom died a uatural death, but were gencrally put to death and perished in their own blood. Since then it is certain, that you rule with tyranny and recklessness, and that you rob and crush the poor, you cannot expect anything else than that you shall perish as those of your character have perished before you. . . . . I would then, with all faithfulness, advise that several counts and lords be selected from the nobility, that several councilmen be chosen from the cities, and that the matter be attended to, and amicably settled, that you eool down your rage,—this you will finally be compelled to do whether you will or not,—at least relax your tyranny and oppression that the poor may breathe freely. The peasants should also be advised to give up and pass by several articles which ask too much, so that the matter may then be settled, if not in a Christian manner at least in accordanee with human rights and forbearanee."

In the same spirit Luther also reproves the peasants and shows them that they have no right to eall themselves Christians, if they would overcome violence with violence, and to this end take up the sword, to which God has given them no right.

Germany, England, and in fact every kingdom of Europe needs a Luther to avert the calamities about to eome upon them. And surely our eountry needs such admonition and such advice as well.

In full harmony with what Luther said, we might yet add a cause of the eommotions now working among us. Those in authority and those commanding the wealth of the land, are with few exceptious bound together with a seeret tie, and sworn to labor in each other's interests. So powerful has secretism beeome in this land of the free, that only those eonneeted with some great and influential lodge ean expect ever to hold an important office. The lodge has been, and is, ruling this country.

Secretism is being met on its own grounds. Whilst the Grand Lodges of Masonry and Odd-fellowship were concocting plans to gain their selfish ends, other lodges sprang into existence, just as selfish and just as obstinate in their character. Masons, Odd-fellows, and Knights have been sowing to the wind, and are now about to reap the whirlwind. They have set the example, others have followed them in their footsteps, and are now a terror to them.

The seeret of the commotion all over Europe, and in our own land, is nothing less than the organizations that have sprung up in secret and are working in secret. The eombat is as yet largely earried on secretly, only now and then the bitter contest becomes manifest in strikes and riots and explosions. These manifestations are becoming more frequent every year, from which we may unmistakably conclude that the fight will soon be an open one. The vial of God's wrath is about to be poured out upon the earth, and woe unto those who shall live to see the day. Let us admonish one another to repentance, and by meditation and prayer grow stronger in faith day by day, so that whether it be a day of wrath before or at the seeond coming of Christ, that shall be ushered in, we may be ready for the contest against wickedness or for the rest awaiting the people of God, even those who believe in Jesus' name.

Prospect, O.

THE COST OF REFORMS.

BY REV. H. H. HINMAN.

In the moral as well as the physical world all great accomplishments are the result of effort and labor that are correspondingly great. When the Great Eastern was launched it required the most powerful engines, some of which broke down. The labor of moving that vast structure greatly over-ran the estimate and new and stronger machines had to be devised.

Unlike man, God makes no mistakes in his adaption of means to ends, and we can safely estimate the grandeur of the one by the greatness of the other. That he might have a chosen and peculiar people, required four hundred years of development and forty of speeial training in the wilderness. From the inauguration of the Gospel dispensation down to the overthrow of American slavery, there has not been a step in human progress that has not been attained at a cost of effort and suffering that can never be computed. As nothing can compare in value with the enthronement of Christ as our King of Kings and Lord of Lords, so nothing can equal what it has, and will cost, both to the Master and to his servants; and this is true both of this great work as a whole, and of that done for each individual soul that is made a partaker in the Divine Kingdom.

This is true of all the minor and subordinate reforms. They always cost in proportion to their value. We are exceedingly apt to underestimate both value and cost. We should not be surprised that some who have begun to build without first counting the cost, should grow weary and fall out of the ranks, nor is it strange that others who have made an underestimate both of cost and value, should be greatly cast down, when they find themselves disappointed.

When the Master told his disciples something of what it would cost them to be his followers, "Many went back and walked no more with him." To us as to the twelve, he says, "Will ye go away also?" We need a strong assurance, too, of faith to answer as did Peter, "To whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life."

Unlike modern preachers our Lord never underestimated nor understated the diffieulties of a holy life. He distinctly told his disciples that they should be hated of all men for his sake and that the time should come when he that killed them would think he was doing God serviee. Nothing short of forsaking all that we have eonsists with the obtainment of the true riches. If then our hearts are sometimes cast down by the slow progress of the Lord's work, we are to encourage ourselves that these very diffieulties are the measure of the value to be attained and that when the Master gave it to us to do, he well knew how much it would cost us. We need, too, to reflect that Christ was manifested that he might destroy the works of the devil, that all power in heaven and earth is given unto him and that he "shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied." Christ is himself the precious pledge that all shall be yet aecomplished for which we labor and pray. "For he that sparcd not his own Son but freely gave him for our sake, how shall he not with him freely give us all things."

WEEKDAY SERMON.

BY E. E. FLAGG.

I had a talk with Sister Commonsense the other day, on a subject that I believe has more than any other burdened the conseiences and harassed the souls of good Christian women since the days of St. Peter—the subject of dress. Have not many of us at times been inclined to envy the Quakers and early Methodists with their set rules of discipline that made the whole matter so delightfully easy by preseribing a certain form, and thus doing away with all personal responsibility?—and it is just this trouble of deeiding for ourselves that human nature likes to shirk. But Sister Commonseuse believes that the real spirit of the Gospel is variety in unity;—that liberty of individual tastes and likings in the matter of dress is the right of all Christian women, to be used, not abused, for the fashion of this world passes away, but the influence of our example even in trifles will not pass away;—that example, that influeuce has become a part of Eternity.

I notice that she always wears neatly fitting dresses of some dark stuff; delights in plain servicable wash-goods for the house, and black alpaca or cashmere for the street; eschews on the one haud oddity or quaintness, and on the other all that unreasonable furbelowing, ruffling aud trimming which make dressmaking and dressmaker's bills such a terror in our modern days. A brooch, or a bow of ribbon, with immaculate linen or muslin at throat and wrists is to the whole picture what that single touch of bright color in the foreground is to the general dusk and gloom of one of Turner's sea pieces. She has a way, moreover, of making the whole subject seem wonderfully plain by going "to the law and to the testimony" when it is under discussion. One of her strongholds is the third chapter of Isaiah.

"That picture of a Jewish lady burdeued with useless ornaments applies just as well to an American lady loaded with jewelry, and the apostle's prohibition of 'gold and pearls and costly array' is as binding now as it ever was. From these two passages alone I should lay down as axiom first, that mere ornament which serves no useful purpose whatever should be discarded. Don't you know that Ruskin has laid down this same rule as one of the chief laws of architecture? The Bible and Science, once thought to be hopelessly divorced, are meetiug half way, and now Art and the Bible are reaching over that wall of separation which man, not God, has put between them, to clasp hands. The eleventh commandment as somebody calls it, bears directly on this subjeet. Would so many of our churches deserve that scathing rebuke of St. James if every Christian woman took it right home to her heart, and felt that she had no right by the law of love to shame her poorer sister by flaunting in costly attire in the house of God? Would so many poor girls be led into folly and sin by the desire to ape—it may be their minister's wife or their Sabbath school teacher? Yet there is no quarrel between God's word and true beauty. The lilies of the field should teach us that. How exquisitely he has adapted to every flower its natural robe! If the dandelion could be an other color it would cease to be spring's golden star of promise, sweet with old time memories for all weary eyes and troubled hearts. If the violet could don searlet or crimson she would no longer be the blessed type of God's hidden ones as dear to him in their lowliness and insignificance as the cedar of Lebanon. It is a woman's right—nay, her duty to choose garments of style and color most becoming to her face and figure, and once chosen to allow no material change, except those slow and imperceptible changes made to suit advancing years. This gives not only the charm of individuality, but saves a deal of precious time. 'We are bought with a price.' How can we take that which is a part of ourselves and was once bought on the cross with nameless agonies and fritter it away on the perpetually recurring dress question? And as to 'drawing the line' every woman must do it herself. I don't believe in dogmatizing in this matter more than on any other. But I do believe," added Sister Commonsense with a smile, "that if we ask wisdom of him who clothes the lilies, he will give to us liberally and upbraid not."

A NATION'S PRAYER.

Great God, to thee we come;
On wings of faith upborne
  Riseth our prayer.
For him who rules our land,
Ask we thy guiding hand,
His thoughts and ways command,
  Grant him thy care.

Bless those who him advise,
May they with honest eyes
  Stand in thy sight.
Their hearts with wisdom true,
Boldness and strength endue;
Let all they say and do
  Be for the right.

May all among us dwell
Pure, incorruptible;
  Ruling with care.
Self-interest may they shun;
Help them to seek alone
A nation's good, its own
  Highest welfare.

Grant, Lord, that we, whose will
These posts of honor fill,
  "One" with them stand.
May we success attain;
Material blessings gain;
A moral power maintain
  Throughout the land.

May friendly feeling reign
Through all our vast domain;
  Sweet peace be won.
Break down the mighty gates
Of party strifes and hates;
The brotherhood of States
  Unite in one.

May knowledge, liberty,
And pure religion be Spread through our land;
Thus shall our nation live;
Luster to ages give;
Unharmed by foes she'll thrive—
  Thy Name commend.

"THE ROD OF GOD."

Exodus 4: 20, and 17: 9.

Moses by using the rod of God caused the Red sea to divide that the people might pass over, and when he smote the rock the water gushed out to quench the thirst of the people. By it he overcame difficulties that would have otherwise been insurmountable. So the Christian by the offered help of God can do all the occasion requires, "rejoice without ceasing and in everything give thanks." Christian laborers do well to remember this. Whoever undertakes to fight life's battle without the shield of faith, the rod of God, the anointing of the Holy Spirit, will fail. Our Lord Jesus Christ has conquered the world, and the feeblest child may enter into his victory and become more than conqueror. Many so-called reformers only beat the air when they work without Christ. Without his strength, they grow weary; without his rod, Satan is more than a match for them; without his presence, the way is dark and lonely: without his wisdom, the battle will be badly planned and unsuccessfully fought; but with the rod of God in our hand, seas of difficulty part; the chariot wheels of our enemies drag heavily; bread comes down from heaven; water gushes from the rock; one shall chase a thousand, and two shall put ten thousand to flight; and when consecrated feet only touch the brink of the Jordan, its waters though at the flood of harvest shall recede, and the blood redeemed host shall pass over dry shod and rejoicing. Ye workers in the vineyard of the Lord, be sure that ye have the rod of God in your hand. Go not forth to uncertain conflict, but accept the offered partnership of him who has already conquered the world. There is no lack then. Your commissary stores embrace the resources of the universe; your surgeon general is the Great Physician; are your forces insufficient? legions of angels are at hand; heaven and earth may pass away, but one hair of your head shall never perish. Then will joy fill your hearts greater than that of those who gather the harvest, for you garner sheaves unto eternal life. They that sow and they that reap shall rejoice together. In those days saith the Lord, "I will put my laws into their minds, and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people."

JOSEPH COOK ON MORMONISM.

Open your compasses and put down one point of them on Salt Lake City, spread them five hundred miles, draw your circle, and the circumference will pass through or shut out in every one of the thirteen States and Territories nearest the Pacific. If the roots of the Mormon cancer run out until they directly or indirectly affect politics and social life five hundred miles on all sides of this center, you will find the thirteen States and Territories next the Pacific represented in Congress by Senators and Representatives greatly under the influence of the Mormon vote, and largely governed at important crises by considerations of prudence, suggested by the interests of the Mormon oligarchy.

Only 15,000 Mormons are polygamists; but they have such immense privileges that they may be compared justly with the oligarchy of the slave-power. They rule the remaining mass of the Mormon populations even more sternly than the slave-oligarchy ruled the populations of the slave States. They have a scheme of filling the territory between the Rocky mountains and the Sierra Nevadas with Mormon institutions; and that scheme, I believe, exerts quite as much influence upon them as the scheme of building a slave-holding confederacy around the Gulf of Mexico, exercised upon the slave-holding oligarchy. Put your ear upon the old slave States, ask what the secret hope of the slave-oligarchy was, and you will find that those who held great numbers of slaves expected to be petty nabobs; that they were to be the foremost people in an aristocracy built around the Gulf of Mexico, including the Cubas and Mexico, and perhaps Brazil itself at last. That secret hope never was much discussed in public; but it was the real soul of the slave-holding rebellion. I believe the soul of the Mormon movement is the hope of building a Mormon political power, ultimately to be either victorious over the federal power or independent of it. Disloyalty in the Mormon priesthood appears to me to be quite as great a mischief as polygamy in the Mormon population.

Not many months ago—as I had occasion on my lecture-tour to hear several times from shrewd politicians—President Taylor and George Q. Cannon made up a ticket, for what? For the voters of Idaho. They sent the names of their own nominees to Mormon settlements in Idaho, and, of course, the Mormon population there voted solidly for them. Usually the Democrats and the Mormons, in the Territories and States adjoining Utah, have voted together, and they have sometimes made a formidable coalition. But the Democrats were so much disgusted with this attempt at dictation that they revolted, and the Mormon ticket was whipped, horse, foot, and dragoons, and this for the first time. The boldness of this dictation is to be noticed. A small Mormon population in southern Colorado revolted against the political dictation of the Mormon leaders in Salt Lake City, and endeavored to vote as they thought best. Who were they? Chiefly recruits that had been brought in from North Carolina, Americans, not accustomed to the slavish obedience of European peasants. You must not infer from the revolt of a few American-born Mormons that the mass of the Mormon population are likely to revolt under the political dictation of the priesthood. The general truth is that the man who sits in Brigham Young's office, and sends out orders over the telegraph lines that center in that spot, is an autocrat, not only religiously but politically. He determines the vote of the Mormon population as a mass. Of course, I am speaking roundly; there may be individual exceptions. One of Brigham Young's sons, a graduate of Ann Arbor, who has lately revolted from Mormonism, affirmed in Salt Lake City, not long since, that out of 18,000 votes cast for a certain Mormon candidate, at least 17,999 were cast purely as the result of dictation. * * * * * *

National law in Utah is a sword without a hilt. It is a Gentile blade with a Mormon hilt, if it has any hilt at all. The problem of highest legislative importance in Utah is how to put a Gentile hilt on the Gentile sword.

A Massachusetts girl, coming home through the sage-bushes from her school-house in Utah, where she was teaching school for a pittance, heard a bullet whistling past her head. She supposed that possibly this might be the result of accident; some hunter on the hill might have mistaken her for game. She said nothing of the matter; but, within a week, the same thing occurred again; and when, within a fortnight, it had occurred three times, she made her will, and said to her superior in the list of officers of the schools, "If anything happens to me, you will find a paper in my portfolio giving directions as to what is to be done with my small effects. It may be," she said, "that the firing has been accidental or intended merely to frighten me; but that seems hardly a probable theory." These facts were laid before the Mormon bishop in whose district they occurred, and he, from motives of prudence, restrained the conspirators against the life of this teacher. That happened in a rural quarter, not in Salt Lake City. I suppose there is no danger of a teacher being shot at in the streets of Salt Lake City; but God knows how soon a riot may spring up there. I have spoken twice at crowded anti-Mormon indignation meetings in Salt Lake City, and have been as frank there as I would be here; but there were officers of the United States Army on or near the platform. There was no insult offered. Without the soldiers at Camp Douglas, there would have been danger of a riot. The young women who are teaching Christian schools in Utah are worthy of your loftiest respect; for some of them, day by day, take their lives in their hands, and "carry the war into Africa." at the risk of all that is dearest and noblest in the feminine nature—that is, at the risk of insult, and of losing their opportunity of usefulness and perhaps life itself. I am not anxious to exaggerate the dangers of teachers in Utah; but, in the rural districts, I believe assassination is one of them. You may judge, therefore, whether I do not regard with reverence the work of the New West Education Commission, and of the Presbyterian schools, and of the Methodist, and of the Baptist, and of the Episcopalian. God bless them all, above all our thought and prayer! And yet, let us remember, that, while they are efficient, they do not to the local judges of this topic, appear to be sufficient to solve the problem, before a dangerous strong pressure will be brought to bear upon Congress for the admission of Utah as a State into the Union. Schools and churches may reach a large portion of the Mormon youth, and yet hardly touch the mass of peasants above school-age and brought into Utah from Europe in a constant stream.

What remedies do the evils of Mormonism, as seen in a near view of them, now call for?

1. The government of the Territory by a territorial commission, or its equivalent, as recommended by Governor Murray and by the Cullom and Cassidy bills.

2. If this is not granted by Congress, then, as a temporary measure, the extension of the powers of the present Utah commission, according to their own request in their last report.

3. The exclusion of Utah from the Union, until the power of the non-Mormon population of the Territory is in the ascendant.

4. A national constitutional amendment, prohibiting polygamy.

5. A national divorce-law. Let us smite with clean hands, and put down successive polygamy in New England and the Mississippi valley in our attempt to put down synchronous polygamy in Utah.

6. Anti-polygamy leagues, to organize public effort against polygamy.

7. Circulars from the chief ecclesiastical bodies in the United States to the State churches in European countries from which Mormon emigrants are chiefly drawn, setting forth the true character of Mormonism.

8. Similar circulars from the Government to our consular and diplomatic agents abroad, according to the Evarts suggestion.

9. The vigorous support of Protestant schools and missions in Utah.

10. Turning back Mormon immigrants from our shores as prospective violators of our laws.

—The Congregationalist says: "The church of Christ is on every side yielding to the pressure of a Christless world. It is adopting the customs and habits of a thoroughly worldly society."

William O. Stoddard relates that when Abraham Lincoln finished the second reading of the Emancipation Proclamation before the Cabinet, presenting his reasons for its immediate publicity, he added in a low voice and reverently: "And I have promised my God that I will do it." Mr. Chase, sitting close by asked: "Did I understand you correctly, Mr. President?" Mr. Lincoln responded: "I made a solemn vow before God, that if General Lee should be driven back from Pennsylvania, I would crown the result by the declaration of freedom to the slaves."

BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS:

OR

THE QUESTION OF THE HOUR.

BY E. E. FLAGG AUTHOR OF "HOLDEN WITH CORDS."

CHAPTER XII.

THE YOKE OF BONDAGE.

The yoke of fraternal love and duty fastened so long ago on Nelson's boyish shoulders by a mother's dying hand, had often been a fetter on the freedom of his personal action—on his soul, never. But when he ignorantly degraded his manhood to wear the yoke of a secret labor union, he found, like many another honest American working man, that he had sold his birthright of liberty for a mess of pottage. He had never been a very active member, but had contented himself for the most part with simply paying his dues, and cherishing the comfortable delusion that he was thereby helping to rear up a breakwater against the greed and tyranny of capital. Thus he was as ignorant as any outsider of the dark designs hatched in its secret conclaves; or how, little by little, through the operation of that law in lodgery, certain as any law in mechanics, (by which the unprincipled, unscrupulous element as surely rises to the top as the decent, virtuous, Christian element sinks to the bottom) a new class of leaders developed by the present crisis were coming to the front, whose regard for the laborer was like that of a wolf for a sheep

Nelson was slowly waking up to the consciousness that their yoke was hard and their burden anything but light. His hope of a speedy marriage, his dream of some quiet prairie farm where his life and Martha's should glide away in rural peace, the dream which had so often come to him in the heat and grime of the workshop like a vision of cool waters—all this he must put far away into the indefinite future. The faster Tom regained health and strength the nearer came the time when he must take up his old burden of anxiety. And the worst of it was he was powerless. He could say some very true and bitter things of the few leaders who, to serve their own selfish ends, were willing to keep three or four hundred men out of employment. But he must bear it, though the cords were already beginning to cut into the flesh.

Nelson Newhall was not a physical or moral coward to be afraid of men he despised—and yet he was afraid. We bespeak for him the reader's charity, however, as well as for the minister whom one or two Masons or Odd-fellows in his congregation can intimidate so effectually; not that they wield as individuals more influence than others, but the whole lodge power stands behind them—that subtle, mysterious, Satanic force of which Revelation is full of dim hints; that backs up every popular iniquity; that cannot be grasped, or measured, or analyzed; that sways politicians, controls legislatures, gags the pulpit, persecutes the saints; and which to resist means in short either more courage or more faith in God than most men possess.

But matters were coming to a crisis. The dangerous, vicious element among the strikers was as wax in the hands of the leaders; and in fact Mr. Gerrish, who was a professional labor agitator, had instigated more than one riot and directed more than one assassination while engaged in that congenial field among the Molly Maguires of the coal regions.

The day the non-unionists were expected to arrive passed off quietly, though an extra force of police had been engaged in anticipation of trouble. But the following night the watchman, in his tour of inspection through the works, discovered a suspicious-looking parcel, which, on examination, was found to be an infernal machine containing enough dynamite to wreck the entire building. That the perpetrators of the act designed to destroy life as well as property there could be no doubt. Jacksonville was thrown into a fever of excitement over the diabolical attempt; the papers chronicled it in startling headlines; men and women discussed it with blanched faces; and those astute gentlemen, the detectives, hastened to the spot, made an examination of the premises, looked wise, and stated to the satisfaction of all inquisitive interviewers that they had found a clue, but did not wish at present to give further information.

Stephen Howland, with the sturdy yeoman blood in his viens that had loved justice and hated tyranny since the day it wrested Magna Charta from an unwilling king, could not but feel a keen interest in the struggle, despite his horror of such lawless methods of warfare on the part of the laborers.

"What a pity," he said to Mr. Basset, "that working men can't be made to see that when a third party with interests diametrically opposite to either, steps in between them and their employers, it must only lengthen and make more deadly this unnatural strife between labor and capital. They are robbed on three sides—by the selfishness of rich men, the ambition of designing leaders, and the grog-shop. Such is the terrible triumvirate that the American laborer has to face to-day; and if Christian people cannot force something like Christian action on our government in relation to these evils, we must expect a reign of socialism sooner or later."

"That's so," returned Mr. Basset, in his easy way of agreeing or seeming to agree with everybody he happened to be talking with that Stephen found at times secretly exasperating. He had begun to feel, without exactly knowing why, that Mr. Basset was not exactly his ideal of a reformer.

"The grog-shop is the worst of the three," he continued, thoughtfully. "The passions excited by their real or fancied wrongs it sets on fire of hell. And as for high license here in Jacksonville, it has worked just as I thought it would. It has only been a temptation to evade the law and increase the number of unlicensed saloons. Still there is nothing like seeing a thing tried to convince people, and the women are certainly doing a grand work in pushing on public sentiment in this matter."

"Oh, we never could get along without them—they are so earnest and devoted—always to the front when there's any good work going on," gallantly responded Mr. Basset. For though that gentleman had never actually given them a cent's worth of real aid, he was after all not very different from many politicians, noted and unnoted, to whom, if flattering words and promises could be made to take the place of down-right honest help, the women of the W. C. T. U. ought to be everlastingly grateful.

A few fanatics like Martin Treworthy had the hardihood to suggest that the package with its terrible contents was never placed there by the prime movers of the plot, but by men whose secret lodge oath of unquestioning obedience made them fit tools in the hands of communistic leaders to do their unpleasant or dangerous work; and unless the secret societies which hatched such conspiracies were suppressed, and that speedily, by the stern hand of law, dynamite outrages would become as frequent in America as in Europe.

"I've put in considerable money into the Union," said Nelson, "but I never put in a cent to buy dynamite with, or to clothe in soft raiment men lazy and unprincipled enough to want to live off the earnings of honest labor. It is time this thing was stopped. We are forfeiting what the laborer can least afford to lose—all public sympathy and respect. But we can't handle communists in America just as Bismarck handles them in Germany."

"Masonic Congressmen can't anyway," retorted Martin, dryly. "It would be too much like passing sentence of hanging on a family relation. Look at the way they've done in Utah—how they've let this foul thing, polygamy, spread and spread, and why? Because the only way to stop polygamous marriages is to suppress the secret oaths of the Endowment House, and Congress would no more put its hand to a bill to do that than it would take a poker by the hot end. Your average politician hates to burn his fingers. And it is with dynamiters exactly as it is with Mormons, they don't dare to lay the axe at the root of the tree. Touch one secret order and the whole Masonic Grand Lodge would come tumbling down about their ears like the temple of Dagon on the Philistine lords—and they know it."

"But there is this terrible grog-shop question to be settled first," said Nelson. "I hold to taking one thing at a time."

"Just what the Anti-masons said in 1835 when the slavery question came up. And so they stopped fighting the lodge to fight slavery. And what was the result? The lodge sneaked South in the Morgan uprising, laid the egg of treason and brooded it thirty years till in '61 the full-grown viper crawled out to plant its fangs in the nation's heart. And all the while slavery kept growing more powerful, getting a stronger hold on the government, and all the business interests of the country, till it was strong enough for rebellion. Masonry stood behind it just as it stands behind the saloon now, getting up secret temperance orders to do the bidding of the Masonic Grand Lodge—the very bulwark of the dram-shop. Dispose of this question and let some other one come up, and it will skulk behind that—and so on; and the end of it all would take a wiser man than I am to foresee."

To this speech, delivered with Martin Treworthy's usual vigor of utterance, Nelson could think of no better answering argument than this:—

"Anyway, the saloon in its immediate effects is worse than the lodge. I've suffered enough from the rum curse to be sure of that. Of course I don't know anything about slavery, but I should say it was a rather worse evil than Masonry."

Martin Treworthy stopped in his walk up and down the room.

"Don't you suppose I know what slavery is? Look there."

He tore off his jacket, and disclosed his bare shoulders, ridged and seamed with terrible scars.

Nelson stood aghast at the sight.

"Why, Mr. Treworthy, what does that mean?"

Martin smiled grimly.

"It only means that when you was a little shaver not out of long clothes, I was finding out what slavery was. Those are the marks of a whipping that I took at the hands of slave hunters thirty years ago for refusing to tell them the hiding-place of a fugitive; and why the ruffians didn't finish off with a bullet through my brains I never could tell, unless they thought it unlikely I should ever come to after such usage."

"Terrible," said Nelson. "You suffered all this to give liberty to a fellow-being, and yet this is the first I ever knew of it. You are a strange man, Mr. Treworthy."

"I have had no call to tell of it before," said Martin, coolly, "though every single one of these scars I am prouder of than I should be of the stars of a Major General. I only want you to know that I have made about as intimate acquaintance with the devil of slavery as you have with the devil of the whisky jug, and for my part I would rather have fetters on my body than on my soul."

A momentary silence fell between them, and then Nelson said with a sigh,—

"I really believe if it weren't for Tom I would go away from here. Even hiring out on a farm would be better. I could at least sell my labor at my own price without anybody's else dictation."

And at that Martin was wise enough to be satisfied with the advantage gained, and held his peace.

Meanwhile the sagacious detectives before mentioned had unriddled their clue—a piece of paper with some writing on it dropped near the place where the dynamite had been deposited, along with other bits of circumstantial evidence needless to particularize here; and in their Solomon-like wisdom were not simply suspicious but absolutely certain that Nelson Newhall was the real perpetrator of the attempted outrage.

LITERATURE.

The current North American Review gives first place to Archdeacon (better known as Canon) Farrar who takes up a theme favorite with him under the title, "Future Retribution," in which he presents Puseyism and the fatal ideas of the "new theology" as the way of life. Soon after election, Watterson, of the Louisville Courier-Journal wrote for the Review a congratulation to the Democratic party. In this number Murrat Halsted, of the Cincinnati Com.-Gaz., replies with "The Revival of Sectionalism," an article full of political fire and energy. Prof. N. K. Davis dicusses "The Moral Aspects of Vivisection" in a way that brings together briefly nearly everything that any person of note has said on the subject. Max Muller describes the astonishing ideas of the Buddhists on the subject of Charity, and George John Romanes opens up a great subject with an article on "Mind in Men and Animals." The other articles are one by President Gilman on Titles (chiefly scholastic), one by Judge John A. Jameson on "Speculation in Poltics," and one by John W. Johnston on "Railway Land-grants."

The Century is outviewing history in its phenomonal success. For two or three months it has been compelled to issue extra editions making above 200,000 copies per month. The March number began with 190,000 and a second edition brings the number up to 225,000. This wonderful sale is due to the popular war series. In the current number the combat of the Monitor and Merrimac is written up from both sides and splendidly illustrated. Recent events lend special interest to the opening paper on "The Land of the False Prophet," by General R. E. Colston, formerly of the Egyptian General Staff, and leader of two expeditions in Soudan. Numerous illustrations and careful maps aid the descriptions; and a portrait of General Gordon, from a photograph made in 1867, is worthy of note. Colonel John Taylor Wood, the senior surviving officer of the Merrimac, describes the combat with the Monitor as seen from within the Merrimac, and entitles his paper, "The First Fight of Iron-Clads." This is followed by a graphic account of what took place "In the Monitor Turret," by the late Commander S. D. Greene, who commanded in the Turret, and relieved Admiral Worden when the latter was disabled in the pilot-house. General Colston who, during the fight, was "Watching the Merrimac" from the Confederate works on Sewall's Point, describes the scene in a brief paper with the above title. Prof. Langly concludes his interesting series on the New Astronomy with an article, "The Moon," finely illustrated.

Lieutenant Frederic Schwatka begins in the March St. Nicholas a series of illustrated articles describing the sports and occupations of the Eskimo boys and girls, under the general title of "The Children of the Cold." This number will contain the second installment of E. P. Roe's new serial story, "Driven Back to Eden," and in the "Recollection of a Boy-page in the United States Senate" a timely account of the inaugurations of Presidents Grant and Garfield, with several illustrations, and the story of the ceremony of the first inauguration of George Washington.

Mr. John B. Alden's current number of the Book Worm is a timely portion of Archibald Forbes's Life of General Gordon, which will be read with intense interest wherever the English language is spoken. The author, besides a personal acquaintance with Gordon and his work, is celebrated as the greatest of living war correspondents.

THE SECRET EMPIRE.

—The Masonic Grand Lodge of Ohio is reported to have proclaimed liquor-selling a Masonic offense, punishable with dismissal from membership. If this report were true very little would remain of Masonic lodges, for most of the liquor-sellers are Masons. Is the world becoming pious, too?—Lutheran Witness.

—A meeting has just been held in the city of Syracuse under the sublimely sonorous title of the "State Grand Council of the Royal Templars of Temperance." It consisted of the usual number of titled and spangled dignitaries. The membership report shows a falling off of several hundreds during the last year. The better sense of the people seems to be coming to the front in the abandonment of these unscriptural methods in professed attempts to promote reform. The present membership in the State is claimed at about 9,000. From these about $7,000 is collected annually which serves to pay the G. C. of R. T. T. of N. Y. and G. S. J. W. G., and perhaps some other much initiated gentry, their generous salaries. It will be a glad day for the temperance cause when it is fully divorced from secret societies which have sought by seizing upon a popular reform to popularize secret societies. Temperance may be thus forced to serve secret societies, being dragged into this unnatural relation, but in the nature of the case an open and public cause is only damaged by attempting to render it subservient to the sale of some wonderously sublime secrets to enrich the few nabobs who sit at the receipt of custom and smile at the credulity of their dupes.—Wesleyan Methodist.

—The vain-glorious and fantastic titles the lodge plasters upon men of every sort, "the butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker"—men of small mental capacity, ignorant in everything except their Masonic stuff, as well as others—is illustrated by the names given the officers of the "Oriental Consistory, S. P. R S., 32 deg. of Chicago. These "Sublime Princes of the Royal Secret" have the following titles: Illustrious Commander-in-chief, Illustrious First Lieutenant Commander, Illustrious Second Lieutenant Commander, Illustrious Minister of State and Grand Orator, Illustrious Grand Marshal, Illustrious Grand Treasurer, Illustrious Grand Secretary and Keeper of the Seals, Illustrious Grand Prior, Illustrious Grand Eng and Arch, Illustrious Grand Hospitaler, Illustrious Grand Master of Ceremonies, Illustrious Grand Standard Bearer, Illustrious Grand Captain of Guard, Illustrious Grand Sentinel, Illustrious Grand Stand Guard, Illustrious Musical Director.

—Another order known as the "Regent's Association" is reported as having a strong foothold in Chicago; and it parades the name of Rev. Abbott E. Kittridge, D. D., of the Third Presbyterian church as an applicant for membership. Dr. Kittridge stands in high esteem for good sense in Chicago. Such a step, however, will not prove that he is growing wiser with years.

—The fanatical followers of El Madhi have broken out of the Soudan. They announced a meeting to perform their heathenism in Cincinnati last Friday under the name of "Nobles of the Mystic Shrine." This is the sort of stuff the are putting into the papers: "We expect to take the Chanters al Koran with us and gourds of pure water for the camels and the journey over the desert sands lying between Medinah and Syria will be made most pleasant. * * * The expense, including railway fares, sleeper and hotel bill, will be about $20 and will probably not exeeed that amount. The program at Cincinnati will be as follows: 1. Summoning of the faithful by the bugle one hour after sunset (7 o'clock P. M.; 2. Gorgeous entrance of the Illustrious Shayk, with the divan of officers, accompanied by exquisite music; 3. Oriental reception to the protecting dome of Mosjid al Haram of the weary sons of the descrt; 4. Journey of the Howji to Mekkah; view of the sacred Kaaba; enlightening of the eyes of the devotees; 5. Ceremonies of purification; charge of the faithful against the infidels; 6. Mysterious descent from paradise; brilliant, impressive ceremonies in the hall of truth; 7. The alliance or secrecy and silence; 8. The Arabic consecration, and vow of friendship and hospitality; 9. Overwhelming finale and oriental feast, with the arrival of the caravan of dates and wine skins."

—A new secret society, Apollo Castle, No. 1, Knights of the Golden Eagle, was instituted in Chicago lately, being the first organization of the order in this part of the West. P. M. Walsieffer is acting Supreme Chief; W. L. Orr, Past Grand Chief. There are about forty charter members. This is a beneficiary order, having its stronghold in Pennsylvania, which has seventy-nine castles, with other States represented as follows: New York, 60; Maryland, 9; Massachusetts, 6; Ohio, California and Indiana, 1 each.

— The chief body of the Memphis Masonic rite is known as the Sovereign Sanctuary of the United States of America, Royal Masonic Rite 33, 90, 96 degrees. Dr. Darius Wilson is Most Illustrious Sovereign Grand Master, of Boston, Mass.; Hon. J. A. Cummings, of Boston, Mass., Very Illustrious Grand Secretary. They will furnish a charter and seven rituals for chapters, scnates and councils for $200 each; diplomas (letters patent) of membership, $1. This makes for them a profitable business. It is intended by this grand body to absorb all the other organizations known as the Rite of Memphis, Rite of Mizraim, and A. and P. Rite. There were present at their convention held in Boston, Dec. 8th, 1,007 Masons of these several degrees, among them Huling of Ohio, Dr. Robert Ramsay of Canada, Judge J. H. Parrish and R. H. Hathaway from Grand Rapids, Mich., and others from different parts of the country. They confer degrees from 4 to 96.

CORRESPONDENCE.

GRAND WORK IN SOUTHERN MISSOURI.

Dadeville, Mo., Feb. 21, 1885.

Dear Cynosure:—I suppose the lodge is reveling in its shame, to-day, in the city of Washington. I am glad to reflect that our eight subscribers were enabled to send one hundred and sixteen NO'S to all such heathenish practices. Whereas, had we been well, weather and time permitting, we could just as easily have spoken with five, or perhaps, ten times as many voices. From actual experience, I came to the conclusion that four out of every five of our people can be relied upon as opposing all such extreme selfishness.

We are still breasting the storm of "antis," in our neighborhood, as best we can. With thankfulness to God, we are happy to inform you that we find our labor is not in vain in the Lord. Upon the 28th of January Bro. J. A. Richards, of Ft. Scott, visited us. He came not only in the Spirit of the Gospel, but alive and active in the work of reform, as well. After organizing a reformatory church of ten members, with more to follow, he turned himself about, and in a lecture, that the people of Dadeville will never forget, paid his especial respects to the lodge. It is this feature of his visit and labor among us that prompts this article. Ever since brethren Love and Glassford visited us in October last, the votaries of secretism have been very much demoralized. But for some time previous to Bro. Richard's visit, they began to exibit signs, and act in such a way, as though they thought, as no doubt they really desired, that, perhaps, Love and Glassford were ALL OF IT.

As evidence of this fact, a very fine, bland, Cumberland Presbyterian minister, (a Mason) who could not be induced under any circumstances to come out to hear Bro. Love, thought he would venture out and hear Bro. Richards. But if he did, it was only to be wrought upon so powerfully by the direct and irresistible appeals of naked truth to the poor man's conscience, as to render him the subject of common remark by the entire audience. He simply looked pitiable. All felt for him. It was an eventful period in his history.

Of one thing I am perfectly satisfied; and that is, both saint and sinner, composing that audience, earnestly desired that truth might have the ascendecy in the mind of their preacher, who they saw was experiencing such awful throes then and there, in their presence. But between him and his God the matter had to be settled. We humbly trust that great eternity, if it is not done before, will reveal the fact that truth came off victorious on that eventful night, in the case of our dear brother, who by the way, with the exception of his affinity with the lodge, is a "brother beloved," in every sense of the word.

But to sum up the charcter and consequent effect of Elder J. A. Richards' lecture against the lodge, in Dadeville, I will simply say, that for clearness, force, felicity of delivery, irresistibility, and effect, it is universally conceded, as far as I have heard, to surpass any thing of the kind that it ever was ours to listen to. It had precisely the effect upon the Masons, as has old Sol on certain classes of unenviable, darkness-loving creatures, who as soon as he ascends the eastern horizen "pell mell" get themselves to their hiding places; so they, enmass, upon the evening of the 2d of February, A. D., 1885, took to their respective lodges, and as far as our community is concerned, are there yet; and may they forever remain there with their father, (I am speaking of them as Masons) is the sincere prayer of your unworthy brother. J. W. Thompson.

A LUTHERAN CLERGYMAN SPEAKS HIS MIND FREELY.

Chicago, Feb 20, 1885.

Editor Cynosure:—Of all questions known to and pressing upon the present generation for discussion and solution, none is of more vital and urging importance than the secret society question. It sits in the body politic as a cancer ramifying its ruinous evil to the heart-blood of state and church. Its evil power is too evident and alarming to be looked at with indifference by loyal citizens, who love their native and adopted country, its free institutions and Christian privileges, and who desire to watch and guard their homes from perdition.

As to Christianity, the secret societyism with its empire of darkness or secretism, is simply anti-Christian in the most dangerous sense of the word. The problematic question between secret societyism and the maintenance of true established Christianity, leaves no neutral ground for compromise nor even an alternative—live or die, it is only a question of time. No compromise is possible for any length of time, for in every place and community where secret lodges have gained ground and power it is evident beyond doubt that the church of Christ must go down. For what is the church of Christ without Christ? These are incontrovertable facts to me, based upon an experience of thirty years' duration. They have been tested both in the Eastern States, where I have been working in small and large churches as a missionary among the Lutheran Scandinavian people for four years; and in the West, where I have been brought up. The Lutheran Church of the Reformation is strongly opposed to secret-societyism and justly pronounces those Lutheran bodies that compromise and hoodwink with secret society brethren, "sham Lutherans," who by and by will have to pay a tremendous price for such hoodwinking with an institution that means either victory or destruction.

Time will come and is not far away, when all denominations, which assist in upholding the secret lodges by not openly denouncing and opposing them, will be aware that they are simply helping to prepare the grave for their own church. For the church to yield to or compromise with secret-societyism is nothing less than discarding the very principles of true Christianity. For the lodges are evidently not only antagonistic to the underlying principles of Christian truth, but more anti-Christian and dangerous than Papal Rome, for the very reason that they are secret. Like Satan who takes upon him the form of an angel of light, in order to seduce believing Christians, they take the outward forms and religious titles of Christianity and mix them together with Judaism, Mohammedanism and Paganism, as a substitute for Christianity. But when they shall have gained sufficient power they will prove their true condition.

I shall certainly subscribe for your paper in the near future; and am willing to lend any just influence to promote its cause, for it is not only a good, just and Christian cause; but, in my estimation, one of utmost pressing necessity against the most dangerous of systems, threatening imminent ruin to church and state at the present time. God bless your efforts; they shall not be in vain. I can make good use of your tracts; think two of them saved one man last week from joining a new lodge lately organized in our community. (Rev.) Jas. I. Welo.

WHAT OHIO NEEDS.

Deer Lick, O., Feb., 1885.

Dear Cynosure:—There are many conflicts between the powers of light and darkness ever transpiring. He who in righteousness doth judge and make war will make brief work of the secret empire as soon as the churches, and especially the ministry, follow him. Oh, how tenaciously Masons stick to the error that in the lodge there is salvation, because good ministers support it! Alas, that false prophets should so deceive the people! But Christianity is a cure even of Masonry, as I recently heard a young man testify to the power of Christ to save him from Masonry. Very many ministers and members of churches here are in sympathy with us, but some have gone over to the enemy in order to capture the enemy's army, and we scarcely expect them to succeed. Spies seldom capture armies.

I rejoice to read of efforts being put forth to reorganize our forces in Ohio. Should be glad to assist financially if I were able. We ought to have a few regiments of volunteers in Ohio, each of whom will pledge one dollar or more a year to support the work until some better plan is devised. Our schools must be reached, and our literature distributed among the learners. We must educate a race to hate the lodge. H. S. Kirk.

IS IT FAIR AND HONEST?

Arcade, N. Y., Feb. 21, 1885.

The Voice, an excellent and usually reliable temperance paper, in its issue of February 5th, says editorially that "the only party in the field to-day contending for an issue preeminently moral, is the Prohibition party."

It would be indecorous to the editors of that paper to intimate that they were ignorant of the fact that there existed, before the "Prohibition" party was born, a political party—the American, that, equally with itself opposes the liquor traffic in these unmistakably clear terms: "We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks."

This party also presses among its fifteen articles other ethical measures, among which is one opposing some of the most abominable works that midnight darkness ever drew its mantle over. This is in excess of the work of the Prohibition party and of as real, if not, indeed, of more importance than the opposition to the liquor traffic, in that Masonry provides exemption from punishment to those of its clan who may be guilty of perpetrating the crime of liquor-selling.

This action is made manifest in these words, demanding, "That the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law." With especial emphasis is this last demand important, as one to be pressed in these times of dynamite atrocities.

It is time that, by our independent activities, we, as a party, not for party's sake but for the maintenance of rightcous principles, should make more clearly manifest to our good neighbors Funk & Wagnalls, and to the world, than we heretofore have, our entity as a moral force.

An account of the evident fact that the nominees of the Prohibition party for President and Vice President embraced the same ethical sentiment that we hold, and because we did not wish to adhere to a party merely for party reasons, we as a party, by the advice of our candidates previously nominated, withdrew the names of our said candidates and placed in their stead the names of worthy gentlemen subsequently nominated by the Prohibition party. And now forsooth, because of this defence to the Prohibition party we are counted by the most or one of the most prominent publishers advocating the interests of the said party, as the sheriff would say, a non est inventus.

Brethren of the American party, and of the Kingdom of Christ, let us as such, come to the front that we may be as a city set upon a hill that will not and cannot be hid by our good neighbors of the Voice, or by our enemies. R. W. Lyman.

PITH AND POINT.

LODGE SILENCES PULPIT.

Our Presbyterian minister, Rev. A. Allison, who two years ago dropped his word against Masonry, has gone. A certain Mason at the time said, "He will not be here long." Can Masons thus prosper?—D. S. Faris, Sparta, Ill.

PROPHECY OR THREAT—WHICH?

While conversing with an Indianapolis storekeeper, some years ago, his Methodist friend, the Rev. John Leach, ex-chaplain of the Indiana "Grand Council of Royal and Select Masters," and other Masonic bodies, entered the store, and after making a small purchase, the storekeeper (with no unfriendly feeling to the writer, whom he knew to be a seceded Mason), asked: "What do you think of the men who quit the Masons, and disregard their oath?" The Masonic chaplain promptly replied, "Such men always die poor!" The storekeeper, though a believer in organized secrecy and an unbeliever in the Bible, being a true Odd-fellow, expressed his regret after his friend's departure that he should have answered so indiscreetly, as he thus unintentionally confirmed the Scripture, "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." R.

THE MORGAN KIDNAPPERS.

Eli Bruce was sheriff of Niagara county when Morgan was kidnapped. He prepared the cell for Morgan [in Ft. Niagara] two weeks before he was brought there. Bruce was convicted of kidnapping and sent to prison for two years. Mr. Hall was the jailer who was absent that night to give them a chance to get Morgan. Mrs. Hall refused for hours before she let them into the jail. Bernard's "Light on Masonry" gives the trials and evidence. —A. C. Moffatt, Albion, Ia.

FROM BRO. HINMAN'S WORK.

Before Bro. Hinman was here I could not have obtained one-third of the names I have on the above list [for the protest]. You can conclude that this is some of the fruits of his labor.—Wm. McBride, Elmira, Ill.

FROM THE FAR NORTHWEST.

Secrecy has a strong hold upon this little town, but the question is not agitated to any great extent. Five years ago the writer withdrew from the ministry and membership of the M. E. church because of her complicity with secret societies, and since that time I have been reading the Cynosure and other papers of like character and distributing them over this land. I esteem the Cynosure and the American very highly—but don't fall out by the way. G. W. Day, Roseburg, Oreg.

FROM ONE OF THE SOUTHERN MINISTERS.

I never have read a paper which I liked better than the Cynosure. Some good friend started the paper to me, for which they have my heartfelt thanks. The Cynosure expresses in every respect my heart and teachings to my people. I have never read a paper that was more aid to me in my line of teaching. It penetrates downward and brings up the hidden things of secrecy.—A. J. Edwards, Benton, Ala.

ECHOS OF THE PAST.

We read the Cynosure with much interest and are thankful that a record is being made of past and present events My father was one of the first Anti-masons in the place where we lived near Albany, N. Y., and well do I remember helping my brother do chores at times when my father was away at Anti-masonic meetings or conventions. He read such papers as the National Observer, Niles Register, etc. I think he ever regarded Thurlow Weed as a friend who was ready to publish notices of meetings, or accounts of proceedings of meetings. He passed away more than forty years ago. I am glad Mr. Weed lived to publish his great letter. From my own age (sixty-four) I see that the living witnesses are fast passing away. Would it not be well to get scraps of personal testimony from such while they last?—E. H. Candee, S. Whiteford, Mich.

—The Cynosure has always been eager to print all the reminiscenees of any value which could be hunted up. Old friends of the early days of Anti-masonry have often availed themselves of this privilege.

VOTED FOR GARLINGHOUSE.

The cut of the old Canandaigua prison house is very natural. I lived in Ontario county more than fifty years ago; helped to elect Joseph Garlinghouse to his second term as sheriff. He had then renounced Freemasonry. I was a resident there for more than twenty years. The kidnapping and murder of Capt. Wm. Morgan was the same old story as is now told in your most important works on the evils of secret organizations. Although I cannot endorse all your notions about religion, I can and do most fully endorse all your moral precepts. I know of myself that it is my duty to obey moral law, else I take the consequences, condemnation, guilt and moral death. I was ever happy in all moral reforms in my day, from anti-slavery, the vile use of rum and tobacco and all others, down to anti-secret societies. Yours in the love of all that is good.—J. D. Hazen, Grand Rapids, Mich.

LESSON XI.—March 15, 1885.—Paul before Agrippa. Acts 26: 1-18.

GOLDEN TEXT.—And he said, Who art thou, Lord? And he said, I am Jesus whom thou persecutest. Acts 26: 15.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. True reform brings us back to the faith of our fathers. vs. 1–8. Paul no longer stood accused of sedition. The Jews found it convenient to drop a charge which they could not sustain, and in his defence before Agrippa the Apostle has only to clear himself from the accusation of being a renegade from the Jewish faith. He adverts as usual to his "manner of life from his youth," a Pharisee of the Pharisees, as in itself rendering the charge improbable, and then boldly throws the accusation back on his accusers. It was for the very "hope of the promise made by God unto our fathers;" that faith in immortality which distinguished the Jewish from all pagan religions; the faith which made Abraham offer up Isaac, "accounting that God was able to raise him from the dead;" which made the patriarchs content to be strangers and pilgrims on the earth, and inspired the sublimest strains of David and Isaiah, that he stood accused. In accepting Christ as the Messiah he was true to that sublime hope of the Jewish nation; they were false. "Why," he asks, "should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?" A very pertinent question to one "expert in all questions and customs which are among the Jews," though Agrippa, by his life of sensual indulgence, practically denied it, as do all who "sow to the flesh," however orthodox their creed. It is often charged against reformers that they preach new doctrines, when in reality they are only trying to lead men back to primitive truth. Such doctrines seem new only because they have been so long obscured by the false teachings of a later day. That of justification by faith, preached by Luther, was far older than the errors of Rome; and the present reform against the lodge and saloon, and for the better observance of the Sabbath, are not only a return to the ancient landmarks of Puritan belief and practice, but the whole movement for holier living points to a revival of pure Gospel Christianity, almost as much needed now as in Luther's day.

2. The vision of the risen Christ. vs. 9–18. Paul never tires of relating that wonderful experience on the Damascus road. It is his one chosen, impregnable line of defence—I saw, I heard, I believed. Every Christian must feel in his own soul the personal, individual call of his Master before he can do any grand or great thing in his service, but when he does hear that call, and knows that he hears it, it gives him a power no adversary can gainsay or resist. His mission is "to turn men from darkness to light," by which it logically follows that he is to fight every "work of darkness," and supreme among these is the secret lodge—modern paganism, with its heathen origin and Christless rites. The only way to do this is to follow Paul's example—always and everywhere to hold up Jesus in his glory and loveliness. Before such faithful presentation of our Lord to the world, idols will fall and the powers of darkness flee away.

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

What hope inspired the old Jewish worthies? Heb. 11: 10. Is the Christian's hope larger and wider than theirs? John 14: 2, 3; Heb. 11: 40. What is the best way of conquering the darkness around us? Eph. 5: 8; John 1: 3. f. s.; Acts 4: 20.

INTRODUCTION.

Paul had lain two years in prison at Cesarea when a new governor was sent from Rome to Judea. As soon as he reached Jerusalem the leading Jews went to him about Paul, and desired that he be sent to Jerusalem for trial, intending to murder him on the way. But the governor would make no promise till he knew more about the case. On his return to Cesarea he summoned Paul to the court-room, where the Jews made many bitter accusations against him. Paul denied them all. Then the governor, in order to please the Jews, proposed that as the complaints against him pertained to the Jewish religion, he go up to Jerusalem to be tried.—Peloubet.

PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS.

"Thou art permitted to speak for thyself." But he does not; he speaks for Christ, and for those whom he addresses, preaching the Gospel.—Abbott.

"In all customs and questions which are among the Jews." Agrippa was not merely a ruler of Jewish lands and the appointed guardian of the Jerusalem temple, but was also in religion, professedly at least, a Jew; was well versed in the law and the prophets, and even in the more abstruse traditions of the fathers.—Schaff.

"And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers." This included more than the expectation of a Divine Messiah; it embraced the hope of a resurrection and of a future glorified life.—Schaff.

"Hope to come." The whole existence of the Jewish people turned on the pivot of hope (as contra-distinguished from the heathen nations whose prominent feeling was regret for what man had lost), and the keystone of its moral life projected its shadows far into futurity (Luke 2: 25, 29, 30; 24: 21).—F. Schlegel.

"Compelled them to blaspheme." Literally, "to speak evil of;" here of the name of Christ; i. e., to recant from their faith, and renounce Christ.—Abbott.

"Above the brightness of the sun." It was the glory of Christ that so out-dazzled the sun. Bathed, so to speak, in this glorious sea of light, Saul saw the form of him that had been crucified and had risen again (Acts 22: 14). May we not say without temerity, that he saw on that transfigured form, some of the marks of the passion which he had so often derided and spoken of as the well-earned guerdon of an impostor, that he saw those well-known marks we know the risen Lord still bore (John 20: 27)—the print of the nails and the sear of the spear.—Schaff.

"Rise, and stand upon thy feet." Christ did throw down Paul, that he might humble him; now he lifteth him up and biddeth him be of good courage.—Calvin.

"And of those things in the which I will appear unto thee." Notably these future revelations referred in the first instance to those special appearances of the Lord to Paul in visions, trances, or ecstacies, such as are chronicled in ch. 22: 17–21, when he fell into a trance as he was praying in the temple, and in the second epistle to the Corinthian church (2 Cor. 12: 1–5). Secondly, to those great summaries of divine truth which Paul the apostle put out in after days, in the form of epistles to the Gentile churches—those Divine hand-books to Christian doctrine and Christian life, It was really in those lonely hours, perhaps in the still eventide or quiet night, after the day's hard toil spent in the workrooms of men like Aquila, the tent-maker, that God indeed appeared to Paul and guided his thoughts.—Hackett.

"Delivering thee." How often in that strange harassed life of his so touchingly painted in his own glowing words in 2 Cor. 11: 23–27, and 6: 4–10, must this sure promise of his Messiah reigning from his glory-throne in heaven have come up and cheered him with a voice not of this world!—Schaff.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.
2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.
3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.
4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.
5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.
7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.
8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.
9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.
10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.
11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.
12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.
13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.
14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.
15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

The Christian Cynosure.

Editors.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, MARCH 5, 1885.

Spiritism is threefold: legerdemain, occult science in birth, and biblical demonology, or live devils not yet cast into the abyss. These three blend.

Rev. Dr. Bliss, of Denver, Colorado, addressed the Union Temperance Society of that city on Sabbath evening, Feb. 22d, and his address is given in full in the Denver Tribune-Republican. The address is like its author, earnest and able, mainly addressed to the Legislature, which has several temperance bills before it.

"Set back twenty years!"—This was the cry of those Prohibitionists who voted for Mr. Blaine, and his "permanent source of revenue" from liquor. "The St. John party has set the cause back twenty years!" And in the face of this weak prediction, two States, Oregon and Michigan, have just voted to submit prohibitory amendments to the popular vote; and other States are fast coming to it. The vote for St. John last fall made prohibition, as the Birney vote made slavery forty years ago, a permanent factor in American politics: and, once in the saddle, it will soon get the reins.

THE BOSTON MONDAY LECTURES.

Re-reading Joseph Cook's Monday noon lecture, Boston, Feb. 9, we think our notice of his allusion to secret societies, in last week's Cynosure, inadequate. These are his paragraphs:

"There is a difference between anarchists and socialists; but the most radical of the communistic and socialistic and nihilistic movements of our time are atheistic in origin. We must not regard these enterprises of unbalanced men as unworthy of serious discussion; for they are represented by powerful secret organizations, particularly active in the great cities on both sides of the Atlantic, and rapidly maturing, if not already possessing, an organization that encircles the earth."

"In Europe, in this advanced century, you have atheism in rum shops, atheism in gambling dens, atheism in brothels, atheism in secret societies, atheism in journalism, atheism in many professors' chairs."

"Many of the organizations of dynamite conspirators and anarchists are charged with detailing members, under penalty of death, to commit arson and murder. Even the Fenians have been charged with this atrocious arrangement of their secret organizations."

"It is commonly understood in India, that Buddhist priests, with great revenues behind them, are promoting the publication in London and in New York of works and the formation of secret organizations designed to support Buddhistic pretentions as to occult science."

Now Mr. Cook, who leaves no well-bottoms unexplored, must know the following:

1. There are huge Masonic temples, with apartments above ground and under ground, in the United States, which have cost between fifty and one hundred million dollars. That one in Philadelphia cost a million and a half.

2. That Masonry is Buddhism, Deism, and, in the Orient, Atheism, excluding Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

3. That the secret societies which he assails have no such temples of their own, but burrow with Masons.

4. That the societies which he assails are outside of our churches; while Masons are inside of the church, the legislature, the court house, colleges, and schools.

There is no accounting for Mr. Cook's silence on Masonry, but on the supposition that he is building circumvallations from which to assail the mother and type of the secret abominations, and will speak when his cannon are mounted.

FUTURE RETRIBUTION.

On this topic the North American Review gives us this from Archdeacon Farrar:

"The current theology of a multitude of religious teachers" concerning hell, is derived from "a frightful and fatal incubus of false opinion. * * The accretions of corrupt opinion in ages of ignorance and darkness."

It is become common to refer all that is terrible in the doctrine of hell to the dark middle ages. Canon Farrar, Beecher, and men of their class, would relieve us of this terrible "incubus;" and the North American with an eye of profit and a pretence of fairness and free discussion, always gives error the best chance and the last word in its columns,—Ingersoll and the Mormon, for instance. He who puts truth and error on a level, helps error. For there is no error on a level with truth. The North American therefore helps error as he helped secession who affected to put it on a level with the Union cause. Such a man was a rebel.

These softeners of perdition would have us believe that "It is" (not) "a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God!" No pictures of perdition, medieval or modern, can be so "frightful and fatal" as the pictures drawn by Christ. No language can equal, much less exceed, the terrible severity of his, who was himself the "Truth."

What God will do with infants, idiots, pagans and semi-pagans; the Bible is not given to tell us. It deals with the men who have seen, need, and heard it. And it says that those who refuse, neglect, and disobey Christ, will "Go away into everlasting punishment." This is more horrible than any medieval incubus.

THE WHEATON CONFERENCE.

Our readers, who, with Mr. Dorcas, are anxious lest the sun of reform shall go back on the dial at Wheaton, shall know the best and the worst. The committee of conference are to have another meeting; and their judgment concerning matters, if they reach any, will be given to those who read the Cynosure.

The Congregational people in Illinois and States adjacent, in 1851, sent one hundred ministers and sixty delegates to a convention in Chicago, to "divorce American slavery from American missions." The senior editor of the Cynosure was chairman, and Pres. Chas. G. Finney was a member of that convention. It proved to be a pivot on which American Christianity turned away from slavery. Soon the American Home Missionary committee of twenty-five, in New York city, voted that a church applying for aid, from a slave State, must show that its members did not hold slaves for gain, or it would not be aided. This was final. No more slave State churches would apply, as they had before by dozens: and as the American Home Missionary Society was the most popular gospelizing body in the Union, except, perhaps, the American Board, it proved a turn-table on which the country turned toward liberty; and slavery, in desperation, snatched up the sword and fell on it.

The children of those Illinois Congregationalists, who met in Chicago twenty-five years ago, will yet deal with the lodge, which organized the rebellion, as their fathers dealt with slavery, which was the cause of it.

THE N. C. A. ANNUAL MEETING.

This meeting is to occur this year in Chicago, June 19th. It has been sometimes our custom to hold in connection a meeting at which American party politics could be attended to. It is time our thoughts were turned toward that annual gathering. One year ago, a New England meeting was voted by a conference in Washington, but failed to come off. Secretary Stoddard lately issued a "Request for a call" for a N. E. convention, but countermanded it, under the impression that Prof. Bailey of the American, was opposed to it; which, it seems, was not the fact. Secretary Stoddard now writes that Senator Pomeroy has written to parties in or near Northampton, and received little encouragement for a meeting. Mr. Stoddard also found less ardor in New England than he had hoped. We believe that Senator Pomeroy's letter to the Cynosure sounded the right key—"Move New England to the front," for "light comes from the east." The way to find interest in New England is to make it. Between sixteen and seventeen thousand names were gathered against the profanation of the Washington monument in a few days, and amid snow-drifts, with a thermometer at 10 to 30 degrees below zero. One half that number (and it might be doubled) would make interest and secure such speakers as Gough, Miner, Pomeroy and Seelye; and Dr. I. N. Tarbox, universally beloved and popular in New England, will give the meeting the benefit of his pen.

It still seems to us that the New England meeting is due to the cause; and the Cynosure will accept and sustain it in any shape in which president Capwell and secretary Stoddard shall agree on.

But this need not hinder thought and correspondence on the subject of our annual meeting in June. A little mist lingers still on the minds of the Americans, arising from our change of candidates at the last fall election. Gov. St. John was distinctly informed before, as he has been since the election, that our action in voting the St. John and Daniel ticket was exceptional; and that the Americans could never vote for him again unless he publicly accepted their platform, and advocated it; though under the circumstances, we are proud of our vote last fall. It took Americans into thirty-four instead of some half dozen states in November last. Our only hope of voting again for St. John is to "push things" so as to enlighten the great mass of sincere prohibitionists, so that they will accept our American platform in 1888. That will compel the Masonic-distillery-and-brewery wing of the prohibitionists to cast away their idols and come with us. The first step toward this is a New England meeting called by ten to twenty thousand names. Of the devoted, honest, giving, working Prohibitionists, three to one are to-day with us in heart. Our graceful acceptance and support of their ticket last fall has warmed their hearts to us, and begun to open their eyes to the fact that Freemasons, though professing prohibition, are sworn deceivers; and they will, many of them, back their brother Masons who are distillers and brewers, and stab prohibition in the back, as they did politically, St. John in Kansas; and as the Masons of the Egyptian Rite lately stabbed Gen. Gordon at Khartoum! Sworn adherents to the worship of devils (and Freemasons are such) cannot be relied on to support a reform which belongs to Christ; and prohibition is such a reform. "The kings of Egypt," says Mackey (See p. 125.) "were but the first subjects of the priests." Those kings at Memphis had "invoked the vengeance of all the gods of heaven, earth and hell" if they were not true to their oath. We of course do not know that the traitor who opened the gates of Khartoum, and the Egyptian who stabbed Gordon, were initiated into one Egyptian Masonry; but if not, they were exceptions to the rule. But it may be said that Finch, and other Freemasons who are Prohibitionists, are good men, and they will be true to the Prohibition party. But, if so, they must be false to their Masonic oath; and if good men, they will renounce it, and vote for St. John on the American platform in 1888, with a reasonable chance, by that time, of electing him.

DO WE NEED A GREAT WAR?

A leading editorial in the Inter Ocean of this city puts in a plea for a great European war as the remedy for the present depression of business throughout the civilized world. The writer argues that war greatly stimulates mental activity, stirs up the dormant energies of men, and develops many new forms of business; and that, as a result the world is sometimes benefited.

This is a half truth, and like many other one-sided statements, is most misleading and pernicious in its influence. Doubtless war does stimulate men. So does alcohol, and many a deed has been accomplished that but for its potent influence would never have been thought of. It is for this very reason that all undue stimulation should be avoided. It is equally true of all commercial and business pursuits as of the physical man, that every period of increased activity is followed by one of corresponding depression and stagnation. Just now we are in the ebb of one of these financial tides, that have risen and fallen with great regularity, but in all cases the depression has been prolonged and injurious in proportion as the previous excitement has been great. In no sense is a financial excitement a good to the world. Like intoxication, it may be a momentary pleasure, but it is a lasting pain.

The other half of the truth (and far more the important half) is that both Europe and America are burdened by excessive taxation on account of war. At least seventy-five per cent of the terrible load under which the nations groan, has been the cost of war. For this, the air is thick with the mutterings of discontent. Conspiracies and crimes are everywhere, and the rulers both of the Old World and the New are full of trembling and alarm. Actual war would greatly increase this burden, and doubtless result in an overthrow of some of the existing governments, the repudiation of national and individual debts, the destruction of a vast amount of property, the bringing of accumulated misery upon millions, and the destruction of innumerable lives.

Nor is this all, nor the worst. Nothing puts back the progress of Christianity, so corrupts public and private morals, and hinders the blessed day of "Peace on earth and good will to man" as the spirit and practice of war. Germany to-day is reaping a terrible harvest of infidelity and crime as one result of her late war with France, and the effect of war on our nation is seen in the fact that of twelve States that had, up to 1860, adopted prohibition of the liquor traffic, all but two repealed their enactments, and there has been a vast increase of drunkenness and crime.

The true remedy for business depression in this and European nations, is in removing the excessive taxation. Let the nations of Europe reduce their great armies and war expenses, and let our government stop taxing the people beyond the necessary expenses of the government, and above all let the nations adopt a system of international arbitration and we may expect both peace and prosperity.

PERSONAL.

Pres. C. A. Blanchard went to New Concord, Ohio, on Wednesday last in response to an invitation to address the students of Muskingum College.

—Secretary Stoddard left Washington last week for Massachusetts. He expects to visit Boston and hear Joseph Cook in the Tremont Temple Monday lectures.

—Bro. H. H. Hinman, left this city last Thursday, for Vermillion county, Indiana. At 4 P. M. the same day he found himself ten miles from his destination, with no conveyance and snowing rapidly. As he has faced such exigencies often before, no doubt a way appeared to Quaker Hill, the end of his journey.

—Pastor D. Simon, of the Lutheran church in Prospect, Ohio, whose able contribution on the secret anarchist societies appears in this paper, has spoken publicly against the lodge. The Lutheran Standard has just printed two of his addresses.

THE MONUMENT DEDICATION.

Washington, Feb. 21, 1885.

At 9:30 this A. M. I repaired to the Masonic temple, at the corner of 9th and F streets, to witness the formation of Masonic columns that were announced to take part in the monumental dedicatory services. The cold was intense for this latitude and a stiff breeze swept the streets. I secured a place at the foot of the main entrance which was guarded by a half dozen stalwart K. T's., shivering as though aprehensive of some grave evil about to overtake them. Wrapped in the impenetrable coat of fur for which I bless Capt. Wilson, I looked quietly on while, with sword in belt, they kept us ordinary sinners at bay, while waiting for something to happen.

The monotony was broken by the rapid approach of wheels which halted at the pavement, and two muscular men descending from the seat began delivering a consignment which consisted of strongly bound oaken kegs that looked as if they had been long in service. Each man seized a keg, threw it on his shoulder, passed the guard without resistance, and disappeared up the stairs leading to the Masonic "Sanctum Sanctorum." Turning to inspect the "vehicle," I read in large, gold charaeters upon the side, "8—1229–20th St. N. W., Chas. Henrich's Lager Beer;" which I inferred was the pass to the "Holy of Holies" in the "upper chamber," as the industrious workman passed and repassed the guard unchallenged, until the delivery was complete. Whether the contents of those kegs, or some other magie influence, set the interior of that "Tyled Recess" in motion I know not, but like Jonah's lodge in the sea this modern "whale" began to eject its denizens, who quaked and shivered as they eame into the clear light of day and the braeing breeze of a Washington winter. The poor fellows were drawn up in line, as I presumed, for inspection and so, wrapped in my comfortable coat, I walked leisurely along the line on F street. There were uniforms and sashes and jewels and plumes, and crosses and banners and cabalistic letters, but scarcely an overcoat to be seen in the whole crowd. I said to one poor fellow who was shaking in his boots, "There must be lots of fun in this." He replied, "You bet!" I pitied the shivering fellows, with red noses and splendid uniforms, and said to myself, Jonah's condition when sand-beached was far better than that of this motley crew coming out of the mouth of the "Masonic Leviathan." Relief came in about twenty minutes in an order to move forward, and I took a short cut to the corner of Pennsylvania and 15th street where I could take the number. Halting at a conspicuous point, I took pencil and paper to note the number, and find on footing up the count that the total is 832, of which, 252 were in uniform of Sir Knights. This may not be perfectly accurate, but it is a close approximation to the exact number. I rushed on to the monument by another "short cut" and reached the entrance to the grand stand several minutes before "Hiram Abiff" and his aproned crew appeared on the scene

Here, too, the "Buffalo coat" played an important part. The two sentinels demanded a ticket.

I replied, "I have none, but I have a record, and think Minnesota is entitled to be represented on a national occasion like this;" and stepped in.

Feeling a hand on my shoulder I turned to confront a man in uniform, who simply directed me where to go. I obeyed, and went "by way of the East" to the center of the grand stand, allowing my coat to represent Minnesota while I looked on. Senator Sherman was delivering the opening speech.

After which Rev. Mr. Suter, of Alexandria, offered prayer. Mr. W. W. Corcoran's address was then read by Dr. J. C. Willing of Columbia University.

Senator Sherman then announced a performance by the Masons as next on the programme. The Grand Officers who were to take part had gathered just in the rear of the speakers' stand, and proceeded with becoming dignity (!) to "INSPECT" the shaft towering above them to the height of 555 feet and 5⅛ inches. Some of us wondered how it would be done, but as the sequel proved it was a very simple matter, only occupying about twenty minutes. "Jachin and Boaz" with other insignia of the order being placed upon a table and everything in readiness, Myron M. Parker, Most Worshipful Grand Master of the Grand Lodge, and his aids stepped to the front and rehearsed the following dialogue from printed slips held in their hands:

Grand Master. R. W. Deputy Grand Master, what is the proper implement of your office?

Deputy Grand Master. The square, Most Worshipful.

G. M. What are its moral and Masonic uses?

D. G. M. To square our actions by the square of virtue, and prove our work when finished.

G. M. Have you applied the square to the Obelisk, and is the work squared?

D. G. M. I find the corners to be square; the workmen have done their duty.

G. M. R. W. Senior Grand Warden, what is the proper implement of your office?

Senior Grand Warden. The level, Most Worshipful.

G. M. What is its Masonic use?

S. G. W. Morally it reminds us of equality, and its use is to prove horizontals.

G. M. Have you applied it, and are the courses level?

S. G. W. I have, and I find the courses to be level; the workmen have done their duty.

G. M. R. W. Junior Grand Warden, what is the proper implement of your office?

Junior Grand Warden. The plumb, Most Worshipful.

G. M. What is its Masonic use?

J. G. W. Morally it teaches rectitude of conduct, and we use it to try perpendiculars.

G. M. Have you applied it, and have the walls been properly erected?

J. G. W. I have applied the plumb, and the walls have been skilfully erected according to rule; the workmen have done their duty.

G. M. The several Grand Officers having reported that this structure has been erected by the square, the level, and the plumb, the corner stone of which having been laid July 4, 1848, by the Grand Master of Masons of the District of Columbia, I now, as the Grand Master, do pronounce this Obelisk to have been mechanically completed.

(Junior Grand Warden presented the Golden vessel of corn.)

J. G. W. M. W. Grand Master, it has been the immemorial custom to scatter corn as an emblem of nourishment. I, therefore, present you with this golden vessel of corn.

G. M. I now, therefore, scatter this the very coru which was similarly used on the 22d of February, 1860, at the dedication of the equestrian statue of Washington at the circle in this city. In the name of the Great Jehovah, to whom be honor and glory, I now invoke a continuation of the great prosperity, and all those blessings which were then invoked, and at the laying of the corner-stone of this structure, July 4, 1848, and which have been ever since unceasingly bestowed upon the inhabitants of this city.

(Senior Grand Warden presented the silver vessel of wine.)

S. G. W. M. W. Grand Master, wine, the emblem of refreshment, having been used mystically by our ancient brethren, I present you with this silver vessel of wine.

G. M. In the name of the Holy Saints John, I pour out this wine to virtue; and may the Great Moral Governor of the Universe bless this whole people, and cause them to be distinguished for every virtue, as they are for their greatness.

(Deputy Grand Master presented the silver vessel of oil.)

D. G. M. M. W. Grand Master, I present to you, to be used according to ancient custom, this silver vessel of oil.

G. M. I pour out this oil an eblem of joy, that joy which should animate the bosom of every Mason, on the completion of this monument to our distinguished broth er, George Washington. * * * *

Know ye, all ye people, that we be Freemasons, loyal and true citizens, obedient to law and order, and can never be concerned in plots and conspiracies against true government; The immortal Washington, himself a Freemason, devoted his hand his heart, his sacred honor, and, if need be, his life also, to the cause of freedom of conscience, of speech and of action; and from his successful leading has arisen this nation. To him and the memory of his deeds a grateful people have erected this memorial in the capital which he founded, and which will bear his name to remotest ages; a monument towering above other monuments as he towered above other men.

Grand Chaplain. May the Lord, the giver of every perfect gift, bless all who are assembled, and grant to each one in needful supply the corn of nourishment, wine of refreshment, and oil of joy.

Amen! Amen! Amen!

Brethren. So mote it be. Amen.

I can vouch for the correctness of this paper as I stood within a few feet, where I could see clearly and hear distinctly what was said and done.

When the Grand Officers had finished the Herculeian task of "Inspection," I approached the "Grand Master" who kindly allowed me to inspect the Masonic apron of Geo. Washington and the old book of Constitutions. I then turned my attention to graver matters.

Col. Casey, the engineer of the monument, then read an address delivering the monument to the President of the United States. To which President Arthur responded in a clear, statesmanlike manner, closing with these words of dedication:

"To myself has been assigned a simpler and more formal duty, in fulfillment of which I do now, as President of the United States and in behalf of the people, receive this monument from the hands of its builder, and declare it dedicated from this time forth to the immortal name and memory of George Washington."

Thus concluded the exercises at the monument.

Employing my former tactics I hastened across the Mall toward the Capitol, and will only note one incident by the way. Pennsylvania avenue was cleared for the procession. As I approached the Peace monument at the east end of the avenue, a coach was driven rapidly by. A policeman near cried, "Halt;" but the driver paid no heed. Three stout policemen sprang forward and caught the horses, bringing them to a sudden stop. A parley followed, but presently the door opened and Senator Sherman, thrusting out his head, explained the situation and the driver was allowed to proceed.

The army review at the east front of the Capitol, was a magnificent affair. A stand had been erected for the President and other notables, and opposite him, was General Sheridan and his staff, mounted and drawn up in line, the long line of infantry, artillery and cavalry passing between, with flying banners, martial music, and all the pomp and circumstance of an army gala day. Having witnessed the disappearance of the last company and the dismounting of General Sheridan and his staff, I sought to gain admittance to the Capitol where ex-Gov. Long was to read the speech of the day, written by Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, of Massachusetts.

In this I was unsuccessful. Approaching the great bronze door opening from the east steps to the Rotunda, I was asked, "Have you a ticket, sir?"

I said, "No, I am a free citizen and don't need a ticket."

The man replied, "You can't get in without a ticket," and he made his word good.

I paused for a little to study the situation. There were two persons making themselves quite officious. Both were dressed in citizens' clothes and the elder had on some kind of a badge. The younger man was especially active, giving information and blustering about. A gentleman near me rsked if tickets could not be had. He replied, "I can get you a ticket for $5.00. The man said, "I want two." He was directed to stand in a designated place, and the young man passed into the Capitol. Returning within two minutes he handed the man the tickets, and he passed in with a lady accompanying him, and the young man proceeded with his work. If there was not room inside for all, I was content to stay outside; but when I saw the privilege of every American citizen who is loyal and true to his country, sold on the marble steps of the Capitol for $5.00, I turned away with a feeling of disgust. If there was room unoccupied, it belonged to the man or woman, black or white, who in a becoming manner first applied for it. If there was no room then there was none to sell, and whoever is responsible for this little "catch-penny" business, deserves the censure, not to say the scorn of every American.

LATEST DODGE.

Feb. 24.—An active Mason in this city said to a prominent "Friend," who gave me the facts, that he thought the Masonic performance at the monument dedication was out of place, but added, "When invited we did not feel at liberty to decline."

How is this? Senator John Sherman, chairman of the commission, said, "We declined to give the Masons any place on the programme. . . . This so offended them that they made a fuss about it." The two statements don't tally well, and one or the other is evidently at fault. I incline to accept the Senator's statement, and attribute the opposite to the natural depravity of a man schooled in Masonic scoundralism. The fact is, the performanee of rehearsing senseless twaddle about squares, levels and plumbs, and the silly ceremony of pouring corn, wine and oil on a big envelope lying on a table a hundred feet away from the shaft, was simply disgusting. The appropriate services and dignified speeches arranged by the commission presented such a striking contrast with the purile performance of the "General Grand Worshipfuls" that the stale and heathenish mummery of the lodge became loathsome. The remonstrance signed by 16,000 protestants was noted by the city press. Backed by so formidable an army each one felt stronger and freer to speak his mind, and when sensible people talk about the lodge

THE TWO SERVANTS.

Matt. 24: 45-51.

By E. T. Larkin.

Thrice blessed is that servant
Who watcheth for his Lord,
And blends his toil and watching,
And sure is his reward.
He would not for one moment,
The glorious rapture miss
Of welcoming his Saviour,
Hour of transcendent bliss.

But if that evil servant
Within his heart shall say,—
My Lord his promised coming
Doth surely long delay,—
And spend his time in feasting,
In drunkenness and sin,
In swiftly coming judgment
His sure reward he'll win.

Lord, keep us watching, waiting,
Till that blest hour shall come,
When thou, in clouds of glory,
Shalt take thy people home.
We crave thy loving blessing,
Thy tender, sweet, "Well done,"
Whether thou tarry longer,
Or come at set of sun.

"STRANGE FIRE."

One of the most solemn events in connection with the establishment of divine worship and service in the wilderness, is recorded in Levitieus 10: 1–7. The altar fire has been kindled from Heaven. The priests had been solemnly forbidden to kindle their censer with any other than "coals of fire from off the altar before the Lord." (Ex. 30: 9; Lev. 16: 12.) Nevertheless, two priests, Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, presumed, at the very outset, to disregard this command, and, kindling their censers with "strange fire," that is, fire of their own kindling, they came into the presence of the Lord to discharge their service. But no sooner had they drawn near than "there went out fire from before the Lord and devoured them, and they died before the Lord." Their bodies were carried out from before the Lord, and their father and brethren were forbidden even to mourn for them. They had dared to disregard the command of the Lord, and they had met the swift and sanctifying judgment of the Holy One. In all this there is a most significant lesson for us, who, by reason of our union with Christ, have all been made priests in the service of God.

Fire is the symbol of the divine presence and power, manifested both for our salvation and for our destruction; as the flaming sword in the Garden of Eden, the burning bush, and the pillar of fire in the wilderness; the fire that kindled on the altar in the tabernacle, that consumed the sacrifices of Gideon, David, and Elijah, and that rekindled the fire on the altar in the temple of Solomon. In the New Testament we have the same symbol—the tongues of fire on the day of Pentecost, which accompanied the Holy Ghost and manifested his presence when he came to annoint the assembled and waiting disciples with "power from on high." "Our God is a consuming fire," is the declaration of the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews. And "the Lord himself shall descend from Heaven in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God and obey not the Gospel." This may suffice to point out the symbolism.

This heaven sent fire was the one supernatural feature in connection with the ancient worship of the Jews. "The God that answers by fire," said Elijah, in his controversy with the priests of Baal, "let him be God." . That is, the sending of fire from Heaven was the supreme test, the presence of the true God. Now, Christianity is attested by the presence of the Holy Ghost. This is a supernatural element in Christianity. For this reason the Lord would not suffer his disciples to begin their work until they were endued with power from on high, or until the Holy Ghost came upon them. It is this presence of the Holy Ghost that this world needs. It is in the power of this supernatural element that the work of God among men is carried on in connection with the Gospel. It is easy to be seen why, surrounded by idolatrous nations, God insisted that no worship of him, apart from or independent of the use of the heaven-sent fire, should be allowed among his ancient people. It is equally evident, in our day, that the natural distinction between religion and the religion of revelation is the presence and power of the Holy Ghost.

To presume even to attempt any worship or work for God without fellowship with the Holy Ghost, is to "offer strange fire to the Lord." A single glance at the Scriptures will show us how all our work and worship are to be done in the power of the Holy Ghost. We are made children of God by the regenerating power of the spirit of God. (John 3: 5.) After that, or course, our life and work are ordered by the same power. We have our access by the Holy Ghost. (Eph. 2: 18.) Prayer is only by the Holy Ghost (Rom. 8: 26; Jude 20;) our work and life are by and in the spirit (Jno. 14: 12; Rom. 8: 1–4; Gal. 6: 16–25;) and the Gospel can only be preached with saving power as it is proclaimed with the "Holy Ghost sent down from Heaven." (1 Cor. 2: 4; 1 Thes. 1: 5; 1 Pet. 1: 12.) This is enough to show what folly it is to attempt to serve God without the presence and power of the Holy Ghost. And may not the barrenness and comparative fruitlessness of our work be accounted for in the fact that we have been "offering strange fire" before the Lord? Or, in other words, have we not, to a large extent, been presuming to maintain Christian life, and do Christian work with our unaided and unenergized natural powers? All natural and acquired gifts are to be desired; but no amount of genius or culture—no amount of industry or enthusiasm in the work of God will take the place of a "burning coal from off the altar before the Lord."

In the case of Nadab and Abihu, "fire went out from the presence of the Lord and consumed them." God does not now strike us dead who serve in the energy of the flesh, rather than in the power of the Spirit. He just leaves us to our death. What a spectacle! Dead preachers in the pulpit; dead congregations singing and saying prayers in the pews; dead Sabbath-school teachers before dead classes. The censers all full; the fires all burning; the odorous perfume of service filling the air; but alas! the fire that has kindled them is "strange fire"—the mere energy of the flesh—nature worship in Christian form. May the Lord send us all to his altar for a "burning coal of fire"—lest we die!—Independent.

CONVERTED BY A MOTHER'S PRAYERS.

One lovely Sunday morning eight young law students were strolling along the bank of one of the tributaries of the Potomac river. They were going to a sceluded spot in a grove to murder the precious hours by playing "whist" and drinking wine. Each of them was the son of a praying mother. As they were sauntering along and amusing each other with idle jests, the court house bell, used for calling the people to the house of worship, commenced to ring. Although fully two miles away, it sounded in the ears of these thoughtless youths as plainly as if it were upon the other shore of the narrow creek.

Suddenly one of them stopped, and told him who writes this narrative that he would go no farther, but that he would return to town and go to church. Then the writer shouted to the other six who were a short distance ahead: "Boys, come back here; George is getting religious. Come, we must assist him. We must baptize him by immersion in water." Speedily we all surrounded George and told him that only by going with us could he save himself from a cold bath. To which, in a calm, soft but earnest tone of voice, he replied: "I know very well that you have the physical ability to put me into the stream and hold me there even till I am drowned, and if you choose you can do so without my showing any resistance, but before you do it I have a few words to say. You all know that I am nearly two hundred miles from home; but you do not know that my mother is a helpless, bed-ridden invalid. I cannot remember ever having seen her out of her bed; and I never did see her out of her room. I am the youngest of the family. When my father concluded to send me here (he having been a life-long friend of our preceptor, who charges nothing for my tuition,) he could scarcely prevail upon mother to permit my leaving her. At length, after many prayers upon the subject, she consented, and the necessary preparations for my departure from home were speedily made. My mother never spoke to me upon the matter until the morning on which I left for the East. Then after I had eaten breakfast, she sent for me and asked if I had everything ready and properly packed. I told her that all was completed and that I would be off as soon as the stage came for me. Kneeling beside her bed, at her request, with her loving hands upon my head, she prayed for me. Many and many a night since I have dreamed the whole scene over. It is the happiest recollection in my memory. I believe that to the day of my death I will be able to repeat every word of that prayer. When she ceased praying she spoke to me thus:

"'My precious son, you know not, indeed you can never know, the agony of a mother's heart when parting forever from her last born, to her still a babe. When you go forth from the home of your nativity, to pursue the profession of your choice, and of your dear father's choosing as well, you will for the last time this side the grave look upon the face of her who loves you as no other mortal does or can. Your father is not able to pay your expenses home during the two years of your course of study. I cannot possibly live so long as that. The sands of the hour-glass of my feeble existence have nearly run out. In that distant and strange place to which you are going, there will be no loving mother to whom you can apply for counsel when assailed by temptation. You must, therefore, while a boy, learn to say, No, when urged to do wrong. I cannot be with you, but I will daily commit you to the care of God, who is everywhere present, beholding your evil acts as well as your good deeds. Every Sunday morning from ten to eleven o'clock I will spend the hour in prayer for you. Wherever you may be during this blessed hour, when you hear the church bell ringing for the assembling of God's people, let your thoughts carry you to this chamber of death, where your dying mother will be agonizing for you in prayer. Commit to memory the eighth, ninth and tenth verses of the first chapter of Proverbs. Kiss me farewell. Now the last words you will ever hear from my lips are, in the language of Solomon, "My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not."'

When George had finished all were weeping. Involuntarily we opened the ring we had formed around him. He had stood up for the right against heavy odds, and we admired him for doing that which none of us had the courage to undertake, to break away from wicked companions and go to church. He led off without a word and we silently followed. Without either one knowing that the other had done so too, each of us managed to throw his cards and flask into the creek, so that by the time we reached the church every pocket was emptied of its former contents. Never again did any of that little company play any games on the Sabbath. Six of the number have gone to their long home, each a Christian. Only two of us are yet living—George, an able lawyer in Iowa, and the writer of this incident. Both of us have been church members for many years.—F. Antrim, in Reformer and Free Press.

RELIGION AT HOME.

It is laughable to see one hunting high and low for his spectacles when they have been only shoved over his forehead. But it is not laughable to see Christians hunting for what they call opportunities to honor God, while overlooking such opportunities which they carry with them wherever they go. A slovenly carpenter was once heard at a weekly prayer meeting to pray with great fervency for the spread of Christ's cause—a cause which he disgraced and hindered in his sphere every time he stood at his work-bench. When he ended his prayer, a hearty "Amen" came from a servant who put her mistress out of temper a hundred times a day by her carelessness. A clerk also was there, who, although he taught a class in the mission school on Sabbath, was always late at his employer's store week days. He whispered "Amen!" too—and meant it, so far as he knew himself. A lady hearer, as she listened, resolved to join the Church missionary society, and then went home and found unreasonable fault with her cook. And others also felt warmed to do something for Christ, who never seemed to have thought that religion, like charity, begins at home. The mechanic who is powerful in class meeting, and weak at his trade, is no credit to the cause he professes. The servant who drops tears feelingly at religious services, and drops dishes unfeelingly in the kitchen, has her tenderness altogether too much on one side. And it is a poor kind of religion which seeks opportunities to set others straight, but overlooks its own crookedness.—S. S. Times.

LETTER FROM A NEBRASKA BOY.

Humbolt, Neb., Feb. 13, 1885.

Editor Cynosure:

Dear Sir:—I am a little boy eleven years old. I have a prohibition father and mother, and, of course, I am a temperance boy. I am for prohibition first, last, and all the time. My father takes the Cynosure and I like it very much because it is so out-spoken on the temperance question and other subjects. My father has been a Republican all his life until the last election, when he worked and voted for St. John: and I would have voted for him too, had I been old enough. If all the money that has been spent in the United States for intoxicating drinks was given to the needy ones how much more profitably would it have been spent! Wishing the Cynosure great success, I am yours for prohibition,

Elvin H. Egerly.

TRY AGAIN.

Margy with the flaxen hair
Sat the picture of despair.
"Five times six and eight times seven,
Add results, and by eleven
Multiply—oh no, divide—
And I don't know what beside.
Oh, this horrid, horrid sum!
Right I cannot make it come."
So said Margy, with a sigh,
Crying, "'Tis no use to try."

Gray-headed grandma, sitting near,
Heard the sigh and saw the tear.
"Margy, darling, hither come;
Let me see thy 'horrid sum.'"
Scanning all the work, she saw
Here a slip and there a flaw,
"Ah, my Margy, plain to see
Why the figures don't agree,
Little maid, thy sore distress
Is the fault of heedlessness."

"Oh, but grandma, I have tried
Just as hard!" poor Margy cried;
"But the naughty figures go
Somehow always wrong, you know."
Then to her supreme dismay,
Grandma sponged the work away,
And for Margy's eyes to read,
Wrote in letters large and plain,
"If at first you don't succeed,
Try, and try, and try again."

When the wise old saw she read,
"Thank you, grandma, dear," she said.
Then with bright and cheerful air
Worked the sum with double care,
And the answer—happy sight—
Came at last exactly right.
"Now," the little maiden cried,
Laughing in her girlish pride,
"When my naughty sums go wrong,
'Try again' shall be my song."

LITTLE HANNAH'S WALK.

BY MRS. C. S. KENNEDY.

Little Hannah Hopkins was six years old when she went, one day in early summer, into the country with her mother to visit a friend.

The chickens, ducks, turkeys and other creatures, and the fields covered with wild flowers, were wonderful to her. She was allowed to help herself to berries from vines and bushes; and try to catch wild birds and butterflies or romp with the good-natured dog till she was tired out, and glad to come into the cool sitting-room to rest.

The lady whom they were visiting was fond of little children, and as Hannah was a gentle, winning child, she made quite a pet of her; gave her flowers and fruit to take home; said she wished Hannah would come and live with her, and be her little girl, and when Hannah left to ride home with her mother, she thought that farm was the most lovely place in all the world.

As the days slipped by, Hannah talked with her brother Georgie, not quite three years of age, about the wonderful farm and nice lady till her brother said, "Georgie wants to go, too."

"You shall, little dear," said his sister with a motherly air, "the very next time I go!"

Then little Hannah began planning. The lady was surely anxious to have her come again, she thought, and how pleased she must be, thought Hannah, "if I s'prise her and take Georgie with me."

She kept her plans to herself, however, for she felt that mamma might spoil them.

The three miles seemed but a little way as she rode to the farm, and she thought, we can walk as easy as not. So one hot afternoon in harvest time, when her mother had company, she skipped into the room and whispered:—"Please, can Georgie and I go to walk?"

"Yes dear, if you won't go too far," said her mother.

They were often allowed to walk short distances, returning in a few minutes.

Hannah was delighted that mamma had asked no questions; and hurried little Georgie out of the yard as quickly as possible, not daring to tell him till they were safely started, where they were going, for fear that in his delight he might say something which would ruin her plans at last. As they neared the out-skirts of town, however, Hannah said eagerly: "Now, Georgie, dear, we are going to the farm right off, and you'll have the splendidest time you ever had. And Mrs. Gray will be so s'prised, and you shall pick all the flowers and berries you want, and will have such fun with old Nero. He's the nicest dog you ever saw!"

These and many more glowing descriptions of the nice things waiting them at "the farm" excited Georgie so that the first mile of their "walk" he kept up with Hannah quite well; but the sun was very hot and the dust on the country road very deep, and Georgie's steps were slower and slower. "O see! pretty f'owers," he cried, as the field-lilies and dasies attracted his eyes.

"Never mind them said Hannah, we'll get lots of nicer flowers 'n those at the farm;" and she hurried him on as fast as possible.

"I want f'owers now. I don't want farm any more! I's so hot," fretted the tired little fellow.

"Never mind," said Hannah cheerfully, though she wondered why the road was so much longer than when she went before, "sister'll carry you." And the rest of the way she had to encourage him half the time and carry him the other half; still she kept on bravely, thinking all the time how pleased Mrs. Gray would be to see her and her little brother, of whom she was so proud.

About five o'clock they reached Mrs. Gray's door, the most dusty, tired, forlorn little folks you can imagine. At the sound of steps, Mrs. Gray looked up; and on seeing little Hannah holding her brother by the hand, she exclaimed in amazement, "Why Hannah Hopkins! how did you get here? Does your mamma know you came here?" At the same time bringing them in, taking off their sun-bonnets, and wiping the dust off of their red faces.

"She said we might go to walk," replied Hannah, feeling very guilty now that she really stopped to think of the right and wrong of their visit.

Mrs. Gray smiled to think of what a walk the children had taken, then she began getting a lunch for them, saying, "It's too bad; but you'll have to go right back again; there will not be a horse or man on the farm till dark, and your mother will be frightened half to death about you."

This was too much for Hannah, she now felt almost too tired to speak; and to hear Mrs. Gray say that she must go right back instead of seeming glad to see her and her dear little brother, hurt her pride so that she burst into tears.

"Never mind, dear," said Mrs. Gray, kissing her, "you and Georgie must come again when mamma knows it. I will bring you in my buggy, and you shall have the nice time you expected to-day; but 'tis too bad to frighten your mamma."

When they had eaten all they wanted of the nice bread, berries and cookies and had a drink of nice rich milk, Mrs. Gray said, "Now rest you a little in the garden, and I will help you part of the way."

"I wants my pretty f'owers," said Georgie; and Mrs. Gray told Hannah to pick all he wanted.

When his two hands could hold no more Mrs. Gray tied their bonnets on and her own, and carried Georgie half way home, then she had to go back to get her supper for the hungry harvesters, telling the children to walk as fast as they could. They were soon overtaken by a neighbor who stopped his horse and helped them into his buggy; and when he heard Hannah's story, he said pleasantly: "Well, my little lady, have you walked enough for to-day? If you have I'll let you ride the rest of the way home." And Hannah was tired enough to say: "Please, I'd rather ride."

Just as it was getting dark, a horse stopped at Hannah's papa's gate; and a loud voice called out, "Children for sale." It didn't take long for the whole family to run out, and they all tried at once to get the tired little runaways; and hugged and kissed them till they were almost smothered. They were hunting the house and barn over for the second or third time; had been round the neighborhood; and just realized that the children must be lost.

Hannah was more ashamed than ever to tell where she and Georgie had been; but she was cheerfully forgiven by mamma, who thought there was no danger of her repeating the foolish act; and tucked them into bed as soon as possible.

TEMPERANCE.

MILWAUKEE BEER AND THE HOUSE OF CORRECTION.

Mr. Frank Flower, Commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics of Wisconsin, has issued his first biennial report. The Cynosure acknowledges with thanks the receipt of a copy. The statistics of the Milwaukee House of Correction are an instructive commentary on the commercial value of the breweries of that city, which make such an establishment as the House of Correction necessary as part of the tax the liquor business imposes on the community. During 1884 the cost of maintaining the prison was $20,150.52. Commenting upon the large number of persons who are annually sent to the House of Correction, Mr Flower says:

"The persons committed do not come from the ranks of the wealthy. They compose a class least able, from a financial point of view, to engage in labor that brings no returns to themselves or their families. During the year 1880, 1881, 1882, and 1883, 5,340 were committed to the House of correction. Of common day-laborers there were 1,909—more than ⅓ of the whole number committed. In fact, the entire list, with a few unimportant exceptions, is of laborers and artisans. Thus the Milwaukee County House of Correction is supported by those people in the city of Milwaukee who maintain themselves and those dependent upon them by their daily labor. What brought them there? Strong drink. Of the entire 5,340, 3,146 were 'intemperate drinkers'—drunkards in reality—and 2,175 'moderate drinkers,' thus leaving but 19 who claimed to use no intoxicating liquor at all. A glance at the list of offenses simply confirms the popular impression of the results of excessive liquor-drinking. Three 'common drunkards' were committed, while 1,711 were sent up for 'drunk and disorderly' conduct, and 1,406 for simple drunkenness—total, 3,120. To this number may properly be added the 714 committed under the charge of 'disorderly conduct,' as most or all of them would not have been disorderly if they had not previously imbibed intoxicating liquors.

"Now let us see what this exhibit means, using the year 1883 as an illustration. During that year the persons committed to the house of correction spent 63,050 days in prison. Deduct from this 10,757 for Sundays and holidays, and 1,927 for sickness and disability, and there remain 50,366 productive labor days.

"At the lowest possible average of wages, $1.25 per day, these convicts could have earned for themselves $62,457.50. If one half of this sum had been spent for board or subsistence, in case they had been at work instead of in prison, there would have been left $31,228.75, or $24.55 apiece—enough for a good suit of clothing, or, in ten years, enough to purchase a comfortable home or a small farm.

"But this exhibit means more than days of lost time and dollars of lost wages. It means debts, disgrace, mistrust, increased burdens for friends and relatives, heart aches, disaster to mind, body and reputation, and an increased charge upon the taxpayers of the community."

WHY GOVERNOR BRIGGS WORE NO COLLAR.

It was a great mystery to many people why Governor Briggs, of Massachusetts, wore a cravat, but no collar. Some people thought it was an absurd eccentricity. Ah! no. This was the secret: Many years before, he was talking to an inebriate, and telling him that his habit was unnecessary, and the inebriate retorted upon him, and said: "We do a great many things that are not necessary. It is not necessary for you to wear that collar." "Well," said Governor Briggs, "I never will wear a collar again if you won't drink." "Agreed," said the inebriate. Governor Briggs never wore a collar. They both kept their bargain for twenty years. They kept it to the death. That is the reason Governor Briggs did not wear a collar. That is simply magnificent. That is the Gospel of the Son of God. Self-denial for the good and the rescue of others. Oh! my brother, we might by little effort now and then save a man. By how little or by how much self-denial are we willing to be influenced? I stop at this point because I have no more time to pursue the subject, although I have much more to say upon it. I stop at this point by throwing all the passions of my soul into one prayer: God help us!—T. De Witt Talmage.

it always suffers. There is a more unrestricted expression of opinion on this subject than I have before met in this city. I chanced to be in a boarding house where there were eight or ten persons present. Speaking of the dedication to occur on the following day, a gentleman remarked, "There is a great opposition to the Masons taking part." This gave me a good opportunity to distribute leaflets eontaining Senator Sherman's statements. The same day in Morrison's book-store, speaking with a gentleman of the monument, he said, "There is strong opposition to the Masons appearing on the programme, but I see no objection since Washington was a Mason." At the base of the monument, I exchanged a few words with an entire stranger. He said, "I came from a distance and am a Mason, they wanted to make the procession as long as possible and urged me to put on an apron and march, but I refused;" and he volunteered the statement that there was a great deal of dissatisfaction, and a numerously signed protest had been presented to the Commission. I dropped into a popular restaurant to-day near the "Temple," and delayed after lunch for a few words with the proprietor. Referring to the subject, he said, "There is a bitter feeling on the part of a great many against the Masons for parading their ceremonies before the people on a national occasion like that, and I am glad of it," etc.

The Masonic press may popularize the thing away from this city and with those who did not see and realize how ridiculous and absurd the whole thing appeared, but no amount of "blowing" can save it from the deserved contempt of every unbiased person who was present. My judgment is that this lie about being invited, etc., is a device to escape the odium which they find attaching to the senseless, graceless, heathen mummeries of pagan performance. The remonstrance did more than all else to liberate the tongues of men and women awed into silence by the presence of a concealed foe, and I propose three cheers and a vote of thanks for those who were instrumental in procuring and placing on record this testimony against the lodge.

The Churches.

—At a meeting of the Presbyterian ministers at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, February 9, resolutions were passed strongly denouncing roller-skating.

—In Kansas City, Mo., Mr. Varley, the English evangelist, is holding services, and a marked religious interest is apparent throughout the city.

—The Congregational church at Batavia, Ill., has held revival meetings during several weeks past, conducted by the pastor, Rev. C. S. Leeper. The result has been a deeper spiritual interest and activity among the church members, and quite a number of eonversions.

—The Rev. Dr. Lowry, well known as the eomposer of popular hymns, has resigned the pastorate of the Park Avenue Baptist Church, Plainfield, N. J., giving as a reason the lack of interest in church work on the part of the congregation. He announces his intention to not again become the pastor of any church.

—There is a marked increase of the missionary spirt in the Chicago Theological Seminary. The Society of Inquiry meets weekly instead of monthly, as heretofore, and has been addressed at different times by Dr. Greene, of Constantinople, Rev. Wm. Curtis, of Japan, and Rev. Wm. M. Stover, of the Bailundi Mission, Africa.

—M. Reveilland, in connection with the Paris Mission Interieure, has been holding some very successful meetings in various towns of France. At Troissy there is a church composed entirely of those who have come out from Romanism.

—As one result of the great revival at Gallipolis, Ohio, the liquor-saloons are nearly broken up, one dealer declaring that his receipts, which were usually on Saturdays $40, had dwindled down to only $2.

—Bro. W. W. Warren of the Wesleyan church, Oshkosh, Wis., writes of a gracious revival now in progress in his church for three or four weeks, in which time a number have been converted and backsliders returned to duty.

—"The American Church School for Christian Workers," is the title of a new departure at Chautauqua. The school will be in charge of Dr. George P. Hays, of Denver, Col., moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly. The Sunday School Normal Department at Chautauqua, will hereafter be known as "The American Church Sunday-school Normal Course."

—Mr. Moody's labors among the students of Cambridge University, are beginning to bear fruit. Earnest missionary meetings have recently been held there, attended by from fifty or sixty to one hundred and fifty students. At the close those who had made up their minds to be willing to go to China, Africa, or India, were invited to remain, and forty remained. Several of the leading men date their conversion and their convictions of duty to Mr. Moody's meetings.

—There has been a remarkable revival in Greenwich, Ohio, this winter, with over two hundred conversions. The meetings were a union of the Friends, Methodists and Congregationalists.

—The Fifth Presbyterian church, Indianapolis, has received thirty persons on profession of faith since the week of prayer. A large proportion of them are people in middle life and heads of families.

—Protestant mission work commenced in China, in 1799, when the English Baptist mission sent out Rev. J. Marshman. Since then forty-two societies have sent out 856 missionaries, including 133 single ladies, but not including wives of missionaries.

—The Congregational church of the Pilgrimage, Plymouth, Mass., is claimed to be identical, in all essential respects, with the church of Scrooby, England, which was founded as early as 1602, and is by this claim the first and oldest church in the United States. The total estimate number of members of this church from its organizatitn is 2,122. The present membership is 360, which is larger than at any perion of its history.

—The Independent says: The Scandinavians of the North-west do not take kindly to Unitarianism, and the movement to establish a church of that sect among the Norwegians of Minnesota has ended in a failure. The admirable and gifted speaker, Christopher Jahnson, who renounced the faith of his fathers in Norway, and, after his arrival in America, identified himself with the American Unitarians, was appointed missionary for the Northwest, and for a time, through his eloquence and wit, filled the largest halls with applauding audiences. But further results he could not secure. He still frequently delivers lectures on popular subjects, but has given up the role of a protagonist of liberalism among his brethren.

—The Wesleyans of England are indignant at the announcement that the Established Church is about to appoint a bishop for the Fiji Islands. They denounce this as ecclesiastical poaching, for while there are in the entire group only three organized Episcopalian congregations, in charge of two clergymen, the Wesleyan Methodists have 1,200 congregations, 11 European ministers, 51 native ministers, 32 catechists, 1,070 head teachers, all of whom are devoted fully to evangelistic or pastoral work, and 1,730 local preachers, besides class leaders and school teachers. There are, moreover, only about 2,000 Europeans in the islands. The native population almost to a man are Methodists, having been rescued from the most degraded heathenism by the labors of Wesleyan missionaries during the last fifty years. The excuse for this proposed action is that a wealthy gentleman has ofiered £10,000 toward an endowment fund, to which the Society for the Promotion of Christian knowledge has added a grant of £1,000.

—A missionary of the American Presbyterian Board, H. N. Allen, has visited Seoul the capital of Corea, from Shanghai, and writes an interesting letter of the state of Corea and its people. The Coreans he finds exceedingly lazy and dirty, at least those in the capital. They will not work, and they get drunk whenever they can get the Corean rice liquor, or imported spirits, which fortunately are very costly. Mr. Allen, speaking of missionary prospects, says: "Missionaries are not at present allowed in the country, though as physician to the legation I will not be molested while preparing the way for the work which will soon be begun. There are at present some 20,000 Catholic converts in the country, and the other day seven French priests and one Bishop called on the United States Minister. These men go about dressed as mourners, wearing huge hats—as large as an umbrella. No one can molest one of these mourners and hence they are safe in that disguise."

—The Lutheran Witness speaks thus of the difierences between two prominent branches of that denomination: "Recent developments in the General Council sufficiently show, that henceforth it will stand separated from our Synodical Conference not only practically, but also doctrinally; not only in points of churchly life, but also in matters of faith. It is a known fact that the General Council all along refused to enforce the four points, to-wit: 1st and 2d, Lutheran altars and pulpits for Lutherans only. 3. Non-fellowship with secret societists, and— 4. Non-fellowship with Chiliasts. They would not listen to the testimony which faithful Lutherans bore them on these matters in the name of Christ. Moreover their periodicals are now beginning to openly denounce the doctrine of the Lutheran church on election as stated in the simple words of the Form of Concord."

—A writer in the Church Missionary Intelligencer gives a careful review of the relations of mission work in India to the civil government from the beginning. His conclusion is that the government has done all it could, under the circumstances, for Christianity. He says:

"But while I maintain that the British Government has done as much as it is practicable for a human government, under such untoward circumstances, to do, I dare not say that the members of the government, in their individual capacity, have done all that their Government allowed them, or all that their conscience should have impelled them to do, in commending the doctrine of Christ our Saviour to all men. Ah! If all Englishmen in India lived the religion they profess, there would be many more native Christians. 'All the country would be Christian,' said a native, not himself a Christian, 'if all your Christians were like Donald Macleod.'"

THE MORAL CONDITION OF GERMANY.

One of the leading books published during the past year in Germany is v. Oettingen's Moralstatistik, which in a short time ran through a number of editions. The object of the work is to show the moral condition of the Fatherland; and the actual outcome is that it shows the deeply immoral state of Germany. The facts and figures with regard to drunkenness, crimes of all kinds, especially against the sixth commandment, divorces and the like there given is simply appalling. They seem to be almost too terrible to be true; and yet there are the hard-hearted figures which tell their sad story. It is shown that since the three wars of 1863, 1866 and 1870-71, sin in all its most dreadful forms has been stalking through the land of Luther and laid waste so much fair soil that the religious teachings and life of earlier centuries had cultivated so carefully. The great vietories have puffed up the people so that they have forgotten Him who gave them these victories. The dire effects of war are not only or chiefly the loss of life and property during the actual engagement, but the terrrible effects on the morals and manners of a people. It is cheering, however, to observe that seemingly the high carnival of Satan in the land of the reformation is seeing the beginning of the end. Since 1876 a change for the better has set in; the people are sobering up and the voice of the Gospel is beginning to find more attentive ears. Germany has paid dearly for the conquests she has made. Her condition may not be worse than that of other countries is and has been after great wars, but it is all the worse because politically and otherwise Germany is the leader in Europe, and her example is imitated. May the Gospel soon again bring the whole empire to the feet of the Saviour.—Prof. G. H. Schodde in Lutheran Standard.

SOFTENING LEATHER

Neatsfoot oil will not soften leather under all circumstances, neither is castor oil any better. Oil is not necessary to the pliability of leather—the leather of the ox, goat, calf or kid. It is necessary that the leather be kept moist; but oil need not be the moistening means. Yet in use oil is the most convenient moistening means for keeping leather soft. It would be inconvenient to employ water to keep pliable the leather of our boots, because of its spreading the pores of the leather and admitting cold air; besides, unless always wet, leather becomes hard and rigid. Oil, on the contrary, keeps the leather in a proper state for its best usefulness, that of pliability. But in order that oil may soften the leather, its way should be prepared by a thorough wetting of the leather by water. Much less oil is required if the leather is well saturated with water. The philosophy is obvious; water is repellent to the oil, and prevents it from passing entirely through the leather, holding the oil in the substance of the leather. The use of water for softening belts in factories is not inconvenient if advantage is taken of a holiday. At night the belts may be brushed clean and thoroughly wetted; then in the morning use the oil. A much smaller quantity is necessary to render the belt pliable than when no water is used.—Scientific American.

HOW TO ESCAPE NERVOUSNESS.

The first prescription is an ample supply of pure, fresh and cool air. The nerves will always be weak if the greater part of the day and night are passed in close, ill-ventilated, and overheated apartments. The nerves more than the rest of the body, to be properly nourished require a full supply of oxygen. They will not endure vitiated air, whether the impurities come from sewers, gas-lights, subterranean furnaces, or the individual's own person, without making an energetic protest. A gas-burner consuming four cubic feet an hour produces more carbonic acid in a given time than is evolved from the respiration of eight human beings. Bear this in mind, ye who suffer from nervousness, that when you have shut yourselves up in your rooms and lighted an argand burner (which consumes about twelve cubic feet of gas per hour), you are to all intents and purposes immured with twenty-three other persons, all taking oxygen from the atmosphere. It is a wonder that after several hours' exposure to the deprived air your nerves should rebel as far as their weak state permits, and that your head should ache, your hands tremble, and that you daughter's playing on the piano almost drives you wild?

An overheated apatment always enervates its occupants. It it no uncommon thing to find rooms heated in winter by an underground furnace up to ninety degrees. It is no surprising circumstance, therefore, to find the woman who shelters all day in such a temperature, and adds to it at night by superfluous bed-clothing, cross and disagreeable from every-day troubles that would scarcely ruffle her temper if she kept her room at sixty-five degrees and opened windows every now and then.—Our Continent.

LUCILE VERNON.

cloth.....75 cents.

THIS is a pleasant surprise in many ways. The author is Rev. W. T. Meloy, of the United Presbyterian Church of Chicago, and the book is published by the Board of Publication of his denomination. It is a love story, not "fascinating," but with so much of genial interest that the reader is in no danger of laying it down unfinished. * * * The moral purpose of the book is to describe and vindicate Christian character, in its more heroic aspects, and it is a success. We congratulate the author and the United Presbyterian Board of Publication on this literary lily of the valley.—The Interior.

"LUCILLE VERNON" is evidently not an ideal sketch, but the fictitious names used represent to a great extent real men and women of flesh and blood. The characters of many of them are by no means attractive, but are perfect counterparts of querulous, obstinate and parsimonious professors who are thorns in the flesh of many a pastor in all the churches. But as in all the churches, there were also good and true men and women at Lansington, who upheld and encouraged the pastor. * * * In its author will be recognized the worthy pastor of the First United Presbyterian Church of Chicago, and a welcome contributor to these columns.—United Presbyterian.

IT belongs to the class known as the religious novel. It is a love story written in the Pansy style, and so constructed as to teach sound moral and religious principles, in connection with quite an interesting narrative. Indeed, when the writer sat down to examine it, he commenced as a critic on the sharp lookout for blunders, but soon he became absorbed in the story, and forgot altogether his critical duties. He also noticed that when the members of his family commenced to read it, they had but little time for anything else until it was completed. Tried as a work of art by the practical test, it must be regarded as a success. Its influence will doubtless be good in correcting false views, and in helping the reader to sounder principles and to a better spirit. * * * Some may think some of the scenes depicted are not true to nature, but the critic would be likely to find, on inquiry, that the very incidents which he would select as unnatural are actual facts. "We often find that truth is stranger than fiction."—D. A. W. in the Christian Instructor.

The heroine, who becomes the bride of the pastor of the church at Lansington, is a wonderful exemplification of how a woman who is a true wife and help-meet may throw her life and energies into the great work of saving souls; aiding, by gentle words and sympathy, wise counsel and brave endurance, the husband having charge of a congregation where the Demon of Misrule held full sway. We follow with interest the history of the wife and husband through their hours of despondency and discouragement to the happy ending, where religion, harmony and peace have gained the ascendency and the good man and wife find their reward.—Pittsburgh Daily Telegraph.

HOLDEN WITH CORDS,

OR THE POWER OF THE SECRET EMPIRE. A faithful representation in story of the evil influence of Freemasonry, by E. E. FLAGG, author of "Little People," "A Sunny Life," etc. This is a thrillingly interesting story, accurately true to life because mainly a narration of historical facts. 384 pages. In cloth, $1; per doz., $9. Paper, 50c; per doz., $4.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"There is no important history extant but has connected with it numerous other histories of which it was the initial point, or the dominating influence. The abduction and murder of Morgan set ten thousand secret springs in motion, as the surrender of the charters of so many lodges at that time, and the severing of their connection with the order of some forty thousand of its members indicated. This story is one of these histories, and is a collection of facts woven into a story. It cannot fail to be read with interest."—Free Methodist, Chicago.

"The republication of the Reform Story which run through the columns of the Cynosure for nearly a year is at last completed, and the book so anxiously expected by thousands of our readers has come from the press of Ezra A. Cook. The book is finely bound and fairly introduces the reader to the treasures within. The publisher has made occasional selections from Masonic works to verify the statements of the text; these make a helpful addition for some who can afford no more complete an armory of this kind."—Christian Cynosure.

"In an incidental way the story tells much about the manner of conducting lodges and much about the spirit and methods of Masonry. The story covers the period of the abduction and murdering of William Morgan. The strategic position from which the author writes put a charm in the book, while it gives a good opportunity to show the workings of the order. We wish all the people would read it."—Telescope.

"It is one of the most fascinating narratives we ever read and teaches its lesson in a manner not soon to be forgotten. It is evidently written for the heart and its words go to the heart. It is singularly free from wild denunciation. Those who are interested in the secret society question would do well to form the acquaintance of this interesting work."—Lutheran Standard, Columbus, O.

"The exciting scenes of the fall of 1826, at Batavia, N. Y., when Wm. Morgan was murdered by Masonry, are woven into the story so as to give the truth of History a setting of attractiveness. The forty chapters of the volume are soon compassed by the eager reader who begins the volume. This volume ought to be read and will be sought as its merits become known."—United Brethren in Christ.

"The story is intensely interesting and the author has succeeded in weaving into it a great deal of information in regard to this mysterious order, which is certainly startling if true, and he gives what seems to be undoubted evidence to prove his assertions. The book is one which should be read by both Masons and Antimasons."—Wayne Co. Herald.

"Our Anti-secret society friends are certainly entitled to great credit for their persistence in their efforts to expose and root out secretism. The object of the writer of this story is to present in its true light the crafty, unscrupulous and exceedingly hurtful influence of Masonry, the parent of all the orders."—Reformed Presbyterian and Covenanter.

"Unless we are greatly mistaken, the work will do more to awaken the American church and people to the evils of Freemasonry than any other book recently published."—Evangelical Repository.

"The book will create a sensation in Masonic circles, and evoke criticism of a most relentless character. The courage of the author in attacking such a rock-rooted bulwark as Freemasonry is something to admire, Fanatic though he be."—Nebraska Watchman.

"Light is needed on this subject and needed badly, and we welcome this contribution to the literature of anti-secretism, and cordially commend it to the favorable attention of our readers."—United Presbyterian, (Pittsburgh.)

"A charming work, fit to be classed with 'Uncle Tom's Cabin;' it is indeed less a work of fiction. The volume is as valuable as a work of reference as it is agreeable, truthful and useful. EDUCATIONAL.

Hungary, with over 2,200,000 children of school age, reports nearly 1,700,000, or 77 per cent, attending school.

The denunciation of the modern system of education and competitative examinations as eminently prejudicial to the health of those subjected to them was among the closing acts of the Hygienic Congress.

In England and Wales there are over 4,000,000 pupils in elementary schools, an increase during the year of over 144,000, or 3.57 per cent, against an increase in population of only 1.35 per cent.

In North Carolina in 1880 fifty-four days constituted the school year; in Tennessee, sixty-eight days. In the State of Texas the school year was seventy-three days, and the school period only six years—from eight to fourteen.

Hawaii, with about 67,000 population, reports 201 schools, with about 8,000 pupils. Three-fourths of these attended public schools. More than half the children of the nation were receiving instruction in the English language.

Mme. Sophie Kovatevskvy, of Russian birth, fills the chair of Mathematics at Stockholm University. Most women are said by the professional wags to object to telling their age, but it is to the glory of this intellectual ornament of her sex that she holds one of the highest positions among the learned at the age of thirty.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

The United States spends $90,000,000 a year for common schools. New York spends most; Ohio is second, and Illinois third. Massachusetts pays female teachers but one-third as much as men receive, or an average of $340 to $1,020; (this fact is not quoted in proof of the superior intelligence of Massachusetts). The average cost per scholar runs from $29 in Nevada to $3.50 in some of the Southern States. The school age in Texas lasts only six years, from 8 to 14; in Maine it lasts 17 years, from 4 to 21. The Peabody fund in 16 years has yielded, in aid of Southern schools, $1,345,000. There are in the South over 100 high schools for the colored people, 70 of them maintained by religious denominations at the North, and having 18,000 students. The Methodists have 30 schools, Baptists 23, Congregationalists 20, Quakers 3, Catholics 2. There are also in this country 16,000 colored common schools, with 800,000 pupils.

We have 400 kindergarten schools, with 20,000 pupils; 50 law schools, with 3,200 students; 140 medical schools, with 16,000 students. Of the last Missouri and New York have one-fifth of all. We have 150 theological schools, viz.: Baptist 21, Catholic 21, Presbyterian 19, Methodist 18, Episcopalian 16, etc., with 5,000 students, counting 1,100 Catholic priests. One-fifth of the theological schools are in Illinois. There are 25 schools for nurses with 800 students, 30 schools for the blind with 2,300 pupils, 14 schools for the feeble minded, in ten states, with 2,500 students, and 67 reform schools with 15,000 inmates, one-third of which are in New York and Massachusetts. Idleness is the main cause of youthful vice, say the reports, and the cure is steady work, and to learn that work is respectable and brings in money. We have 475 children's homes and asylums and industrial schools with 70,000 inmates, New York having one-fourth of all.

These facts and figures are from the last report of the Commissioner of Education.

CATARRH CURED!

Any sufferer from this dreadful disease sending a self-addressed stamped envelope to Dr. J. A. Lawrence, 199 Dean St., Brooklyn, New York, will receive the recipe free of charge.

HOME HINTS.

USE A LITTLE COMMON SENSE.

We know it is a very scarce article and comes high in some quarters, but use it for all that.

DO.

Do the best you can at all times, and that is saying a good deal. Do your work, as a general thing, before you play. Do rest when you are tired if you possibly can. Do sleep at night rather than in the day time. Do keep your feet dry and warm and your head cool. Do live as cheerful and happy as possible, and make all those about you so as much as in you lieth, and in order to do this keep healthy and active—soul and body.

DON'T.

Don't go to bed with cold feet. Don't sleep in the same garments that are worn during the day. Don't sleep in a room that is not well ventilated. Don't sit or sleep in a draft. Don't lie on the left side too much. Don't lie on the back to keep from snoring. Don't try to get along with less than seven or eight hours' sleep out of twenty-four. Don't jump out of bed immediately on awakening in the morning. Don't forget to rub yourself well all over with crash towel or hands before dressing. Don't forget to take a good drink of pure water before breakfast. Don't take long walks when the stomach is entirely empty. Don't start to a day's work without eating a good breakfast. Don't eat anything but well-cooked and nutritious food. Don't eat what you don't want just to save it. Don't eat between meals nor enough to cause uneasiness at meal time. Don't eat the smallest morsel unless hungry, if well. Don't try to keep up on coffee or alcoholic stimulants when nature is calling you to sleep. Don't stand over hot-air registers. Don't inhale hot air or fumes of any acids. Don't fill the gash with soot, sugar or anything else to arrest the hemorrhage when you cut yourself, but bring the parts together with strips of adhesive plaster. Don't wear thin hose or light soled shoes in cold or wet weather. Don't strain your eyes by reading on an empty stomach or when ill. Don't ruin your eyes by reading or sewing at dusk, by a dim light or flickering candle, nor when very tired. Don't sing or halloa when your throat is sore or you are hoarse. Don't drink ice-water when you are very warm, and never a glassful at a time, but sip it slowly. Don't take some other person's medicine because you are similarly afflicted. Dont eat in less than two hours after bathing. Don't call so frequently on your sick friend as to make your company and conversation a bore. Don't make a practice of relating scandal or stories calculated to depress the spirits of the sick. Don't forget to cheer and gently amuse invalids when visiting them. Don't call on your sick friend and advise him to take some other medicine, get another doctor, eat more, eat less, sit up longer, go out more frequently, stay a week and talk him to death before you think of leaving. And lastly, when about to leave, don't say, "Well, I guess it's about time I was going;" and then hang around half an hour before you know how to get away. Say "Good night," and go and be done with it.

VENTILATION OF BED-ROOMS.

Says the Herald of Health: The necessity for ventilating the bed-room may be made very plain by a simple experiment. Weigh yourself before going to bed, and then again in the morning after rising, and you will find that you have lost one or more pounds in weight. This loss is partly in water, but it is also partly in the carbon of our food—the butter, oil and starch which we ate on the preceding day. These substances have been burned up and their product carbonized, i. e., with some animal matter has escaped into the air of the bed-room. Now, if a single ounce of cotton were to be burned in the bed-room it would fill the air with smoke so as to make respiration uncomfortable, and if this were repeated every hour during the night, even then it would not pollute the atmosphere more than the breath of a single individual during the same time. If two persons sleep in a room they pollute the air twice as much as if only one sleeps in it. About 3,000 gallons of fresh air should be admitted hourly for each person sleeping in a bed-room in order to maintain a proper degree of purity. It is not enough to keep the windows open during the day; they must also be kept open at night, or other methods equally efficient employed.

It would be money in the pocket, says the Boston Journal, happiness to the heart and sedative to the nerves of the great American people—especially to woman kind—if they knew how to enjoy walking. For walking doth beget healthy appetite, and appetite cries for food, and food makes blood, and blood left to itself develops brawn and brain.

Pickles are unhealthy as articles of food, and often cause acute dyspepsia. Young ladies addicted to their free use may be assured that they must certainly part with their favorite dainty or bid farewell to good digestion. Cucumbers prepared with salt and vinegar are next to impossible of digestion.

This deeply interesting narative shows what Masonry has done and is capable of doing in the Courts, and how had men control the good men in the lodge and protect their own members when guilty of great crimes. For sale at 221 W. Madison St., Chicago, by THE NATIONAL CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

The Facts Stated.

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt. William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribes his NAME to the letter, but ATTACHES HIS AFFIDAVIT to it.
In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of "secret societies."
The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

"A WEEKLY SHOWER OF REFRESHING."

Such is the language of a minister in writing of the

OF

New York.

—)o-o(—

Read some of the many high opinions of the CHRISTIAN NATION expressed by people and papers:

The True Radical Ring.

I like your paper. It has the true radical ring, and is growing better every week.
(REV.) T. C. SPROULL.

A Weekly Treat.

I have enjoyed a weekly treat, as the CHRISTIAN NATION is just to my taste. I like the fearless stand that it has taken for Prohibition. H. M. POLLOCK.

Par Excellence.

Allow me to congratulate you on the appearance and make-up of your paper. The matter is very good, and in fact the whole is par excellence. I hope you may receive many thousands of subscribers. S. O. LOWRY.

In the Front Rank.

I congratulate you most heartily upon the success which has thus far attended your enterprise, and wish you the largest measure of success in the future. This undoubtedly you will have, and simply because of the merits of your paper, which already holds its place among our best religious Journals, and has put itself abreast of the advanced movements in journalism. (REV.) J. F. CARSON.

Hold the Fort for Prohibition.

I am very much pleased with your paper. It is not a yearling, but I hope that it may be, like England's queen of old, hale and hearty at sixty—that it may live to see this nation a Christian Nation indeed and in truth. Hold the fort for Prohibition! Some of us have had to pass through the fire of persecution because we dared to vote our sentiments on that question, and your paper has been a weekly shower of refreshing to us. May it prove a blessing in this, and be a great power in the work of overturning the greatest evil that ever cursed our nation, and which does more than any other agent in hindering us from becoming a Christian Nation. (REV.) A. H. ORR.

Able Corps of Writers and Contributors.

Sacramento, Cal., Daily Record-Union.—A new paper entitled the CHRISTIAN NATION has been started at New York, under the conductorship of John W. Pritchard, and with an able corps of writers and contributors.

Deserves a Noble Support.

Christian Cynosure, Chicago.—Among recently started Journals we have forborne to speak heretofore of the CHRISTIAN NATION of New York, a weekly of beautiful proportions and able management lately begun by John W. Pritchard....Thus ably manned the CHRISTIAN NATION is a worthy addition to the ranks of journalism, and deserves a noble support.

Fast Making its Way.

The National Republican, Washington, D. C.—Mr. Joseph Bowes, the leader of the Sabbath-school teachers' class at the Y. M. C. A. rooms, this city, is the writer of an article on the "International Sunday-school Lesson," which appears each week in the CHRISTIAN NATION, a journal published in New York. This journal is fast making its way into the hands of the Sunday-school teachers of the country on account of the superior and exceedingly helpful character of its articles on the Sunday-school lesson.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

WASHINGTON.

The sentence of the court-martial in the case of Judge Advocate General Swaim, as finally approved by the President is as follows: "To be suspended from rank and duty for twelve years, and to forfeit one-half his monthly pay every month for the same period."

The House of Representatives on Monday concurred in the Senate's amendments to the Texas Pacific railroad land-grant forfeiture bill. The House also passed the foreign contract labor bill.

The House voted $300,000 to the New Orleans Exposition, but requires it to be applied, first, in the payment of debts outstanding outside the State of Louisiana, and secondly, in the payment of all premiums heretofore or hereafter awarded, the money to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall detail an agent for the duty.

The Senate passed a bill Tuesday to authorize the President to negotiate with the Indians for the purchase of their remaining rights to the Oklahoma lands. It now goes to the house for action by that body.

The excess of values of exports over imports of merchandise for the month of January was $38,343,969; for the seven months ending January 31, $147,679,807; for twelve months ending Jan. 31, $138,-756,652. The total values of imports of merchandise for twelve months ending Jan. 31 were $617,166,928; for the preceding twelve months, $684,405,635, a decrease of $67,238,707. The total value of exports of merchandise for the twelve months ending Jan. 31 was $755,923,580; for the previous twelve months, $788,818,-670, a decrease of $32,895,090.

COUNTRY.

The bill to re-establish capital punishment has passed the Michigan House. The prohibitory amendment that passed the House failed in the Senate of the necessary two-thirds, receiving yeas 18; nays 13. This was a strict party vote, the Republicans all voting for and the opposition solidly against it.

The Indiana Legislature has made a wholesale onslaught on all the temperance bills that have been offered this session, and every proposition to amend or change in any way the present liquor law was defeated by the Democratic majority who did not even allow the minority to discuss the question. Among the bills were several for high license and for heavier penalties for selling liquor to minors.

In the Illinois House Wednesday, Col. Taylor presented a resolution requesting Illinois Representatives in Congress to support an amendment to the National Constitution making the Presidential term six years, and the Congressional term three years.

Whole families in Gilmer, Braxton, Calhoun and Clay counties, West Virginia, are without food and money is so very scarce that ginseng and produce pass current. A special measure of relief has been introduced in the State Legislature.

While at work Wednesday at Lafayette, Ind, Edward Burkhalter, a teamster, became suddenly and incurably blind, caused by the glare of the sun upon the snow.

Roughs fomented a general quarrel at a Salvation Army meeting at Newark, O., Tuesday night, several persons being wounded in the melee. One of the participants in resisting arrest was fatally beaten by a special officer.

Lemuel Fuller, of Argyle, Ill., imagined that burglars were on his premises a few nights ago and, issuing from his house, fired at suspicious objects. They proved to be two valuable horses and had to be killed.

A New York dispatch says that a gentleman who has recently had occasion to acquaint himself with General Grant's condition, says that he is probably no worse now than he has been for some time; that the cancer trouble did baffle his physicians, and that his friends do not doubt that it will finally prove fatal. There is no cause for present uneasiness, however, as General Grant will probably live a year yet unless something else turns up to hasten his death.

Near Keuntz, Tex., Tuesday the boiler in a lumber mill exploded, killing a little boy and a man, and seriously wounding fifteen persons, six of whom are not expected to recover.

An attempt was made at Lincoln, Neb., on the 17th ult. to kill Patrick Egan, President of the Irish National League, by means of an infernal machine; but the contrivance, though handled carelessly, failed to explode.

Near Smith's Mills, Union County, Kentucky, last Saturday, Mose Caton, aided by his sons, took out his wife and hanged her. A posse came to arrest the Catons, but they resisted, when four of them were shot, a son and daughter probably mortally. An attempt was made to take the five prisoners from the posse, but it failed.

FOREIGN.

The House of Commons has voted down Sir Stafford Northcote's motion for censure of the government's policy in the Soudan, Friday, by a small majority. The result was—yeas, 288; nays, 302—a majority of fourteen. It was not expected that the motion would be carried, but the small majority of the government is something of a surprise, especially for the supporters of the ministry.

A terrible explosion occurred Wednesday afternoon at the Royal School of Gunnery at Shoeburyness, England, while a number of artillery officers and scientists were testing a new patent fuse. Three men were killed outright and several fatally wounded. Among the latter were some of the most prominent officials of the government laboratory at Woolwich. The scene of the explosion presented a sickening sight. Some of the wounded had their faces carried away, others legs torn off, and men were lying about in every direction groaning in dying agonies.

The West African or Congo Conference was formally brought to a close this afternoon, having completed the work for which it was created. In his final address congratulating the members upon the successful termination of their labors, Prince Bismark stated that the decisions of the conference had all been approved and agreed to by the International African Association.

A letter has been received at Korti from a nun taken prisoner when Khartoum fell into the hands of the Arabs, and who is now kept in captivity in the Mahdi's camp at Omdurman. She confirms the statement that El Mahdi's troops massacred the soldiers of the garrison and many peaceful citizens, and she states that the number of persons slaughtered was fully two thousand.

Henry M. Stanley says: "General Gordon could have escaped, even after the capture of Khartoum, if he had remained on board any of the steamers he had under his control. He ought never to have exposed himself, but should have retreated up the White Nile as the Mahdi advanced. Even if he had been compelled to leave the river he could have made his way across to the coast at Zanzibar."

A dispatch from Cabul says no little uneasiness prevails in government circles because of the remarkable number of Russians pouring into the Afghan capital ostensibly as travelers. It is the general belief of the natives that the alleged travelers are military men and that their visits are connected with the rumored scheme for the annexation of Afghanistan to Russia.

A meteor passed over Victoria, B. C., at 9 o'clock on the morning of the 22d ult, of enormous size and appearing like a mass of molten iron. It made a noise like escaping steam, and smoke and flames were thrown off. The extraordinary phenomenon was witnessed by many persons, and the ball of fire was seen to descend into the Sea of Haro and sink, a cloud of spray and steam rising from the spot.

The French have occupied the sacred island of Poo Too, in the Chupan Archipelago, off Ning Po. Almost the only inhabitants are the priests who minister in the many temples on the island.

The police have reported to the government that 2,000 anarchists reside in Switzerland, and they are chiefly of foreign birth. The leading sections are centered in Zurich, Geneva, Lucerne, Berne, Lausanne, and Fribourg. The number of secret foreign police has been largely augmented.

A Wonderful Book.

Laura S. Haviland is a quiet, gentle, unassuming Quaker woman, 76 years of age, yet vigorous, who has had a remarkable career of usefulness, and has now given to the world a remarkable history of her "Life Work" as a teacher, at an early day, of the colored refugees in Canada and in Michigan, and in other States, as a traveler down South in the guise of a "berry picker," helping out into freedom many slaves; as a nurse and preacher to the sufferers in hospitals during the war; and with Gov. St. John and Flizabeth Comstock, relieving the destitute and suffering refugees in Kansas, etc.

Her book is neither fiction nor founded on fiction, but is an interesting narration of facts of a most thrilling character, as every one will find and testify who will get and read her book, now on sale at the Cynosure office, 221 W. The remarkable exposition of Mormonism which the Cynosure places before its readers in the present number, was originally published in the Salt Lake Tribune. It will be read with intense yet reluctant interest in connection with the address of the great Boston lecturer. In connection with the recent reports of a Mormon hegira to Mexico the Independent says that the late severity of the United States court, and the conviction of some of the eminent "Saints" has brought constirnation into the councils of Mormondom. Many of the "chief shepherds" are fleeing from Salt Lake City, and a few months of such pressure, it is alleged, will cause a surrender. Let us not be flattered with so easy a victory over the impious system. A system of propagandism which is continually adding to its numbers from European and American communities, and that even sends its missionaries to Turkey and India, and its emissaries to Congress, and can employ the agency of the leading lawyer of the United States—such a power is not going to surrender to a skirmish line.

The inauguration of President Cleveland on Wednesday last, proceeded without interference or molestation in the presence of a greater crowd than Washington has known since the grand review of the conquering armies of the Union at the close of the war. The inaugural address was not long, neither can it be regarded as a very forcible document, the issues that divide the nation being rather avoided than met. The Bible upon which the oath of office was taken was a small gilt-edged volume, somewhat worn, which the President's mother gave him when he left home as a young man. The incident, as an acknowledgement of a tender and noble sentiment, is equal to Garfield's kiss upon his mother's cheek four years ago. In the selection of his Cabinet, Mr. Cleveland has been criticised by the party press of both sides. The two appointments from New York are of a personal nature, and that of Mr. Manning, especially, is taken to mean that the U. S. Treasury department is more important because of its offices than for its business. The three Southern members, Bayard, Lamar, and Garland, will exercise a preponderating influence in the administration council and their sympathies in the past have always been with the "lost cause." Whether the forebodings of disaster, apprehended by so many, are to be realized, time will show. There is at least one unpleasant reflection—that the expenses of the inauguration were mainly borne by the great ball in the evening.

Almost the last act of Mr. Arthur as President, and of the forty-eighth congress, was to restore Gen. Grant to the retired list of the army with full pay and rank. The condition of Gen. Grant's health disarms the criticism which would have been made a year ago. He is suffering from a cancer at the root of his tongue, the result of his tobacco habit, and with it a complication of heart trouble induced by giving up his cigar last November. The rapid progress of the disease within a week makes it improbable that the life of the old commander will be prolonged for any length of time to enjoy the honor voted him by congress. Financially and physically a wreck, Gen. Grant is approaching his grave with the burdens of this life yet, we fear, uncast at the feet of the Saviour of men. Would that a word of repentance and warning might be given by him to counteract in some degree the immense mischief his example as a tobacco user has done to the young men of America.

Miss Cleveland, sister of our President, it seems, is to do the honors of the Presidential Mansion during the next four years. The Union Signal informs us that about a year ago, Miss Cleveland led a meeting of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, and joined in prayer for the future mistress of the White House, that she might follow in the footsteps of Mrs. Hayes, and cleanse the people's mansion and its vaults from liquor; little dreaming that she was praying for herself! As Pres. Cleveland has given the nation a temperance hostess, he may yet give us a Christian administration.

The press of the country is making a great effort to commend Masonry for taking a turn at Mormonism. In Utah the Gentile lodges have decided not to take in any more Mormons! O, what a wonder! And the Grand Lodge of California approves of the action very warmly, as a practical exemplification of good Masonry. Well, what kind of Masonry is it that has hugged these Mormon devils in brotherly embrace for forty years, since the Grand Lodge of Illinois twice gave them a dispensation? Good, or bad? This, by the way, explains why we have not been able to manage the Mormon business. The lodge oath as well as the Endowment House oath barred out the just action of courts. See the Masonry in the exposition on succeeding pages of this paper.

Albert Edward, Prince of Wales, once crossed the raging seas to visit America; later he endured the climate and braved the dangers of Indian jungles in his visit to the Empire of the East. He lately determined to visit his loyal subjects of Ireland—the most dangerous of all his exploits since he became a Freemason. Fears of dynamite and dagger were taken into account, and the dreaded Invicibles were called to mind, yet the Prince persisted in his preparation for his journey. Could a British guard save him from a chance pistol shot or a glass bomb? Alas! no. But when all other helpers fail, behold Mr. Michael Flannery, a Mason skulking in Paris, issues a proclamation, magnanimous and grandiloquent, pledging safety to the Prince because he is a Freemason! That is good. Freemasons, Black Hands, Invincibles, Carbonari, assassins, and the whole round ring of thuggery understand and protect each other.

Francis Murphy's church of Gospel Temperance in Pittsburgh manifested its spirit the other day. Mr. Murphy pronounced a eulogy on General Grant, dwelling on his past glory and present suffering, when the whole audience arose and made the building ring with their cheers. Is General Grant the temperance saint Murphy and his disciples worship, or is this their usual method of worshiping God.

BRITISH TROUBLES.

BY REV. JOHN BOYES.

It would be difficult to describe the variety of feeling and sentiment in this country which the fall of Khartoum and the death of General Gordon have occasioned. All kinds of frightful pictures have been drawn by the Tories, of disaster to British prestige, and of the terrible results which are sure to follow in our Indian Empire. However aggravating the loss of Khartoum and its gallant defender may be, just at the moment when deliverance was at hand, yet it appears to me ridiculous to think that the treachery of two pashas in a little African town can imperil our Empire in India.

Readers of the Cynosure may remember that on the 18th of January, 1884, Gordon was sent out by our Government on a pacific mission to the Soudan. He was supposed to possess exceptional qualifications for the work. He had been engaged in works of great difficulty before. After the Crimean war he was employed in settling the Turkish and Russian frontier in Asia—a work of no little danger and difficulty owing to the wild character of the tribes of Armenia and Koordistan. After our difficulties with China were arranged in 1863, he was appointed by the Emperor of China, commander of the "Ever Victorious Army" and was mainly instrumental in suppressing the formidable Tia-Ping rebellion. Finding the richest and most fertile cities of China in the hands of the most savage brigands; he cut the rebellion in half, recovered the great cities, isolated and utterly discouraged the fragments of the brigand power, left the marauders within but a few tracts of devastated country and their stronghold in Nanking. His rise in our own army was very rapid. In 1873 he undertook an expedition into Africa under the auspices of the Khedive of Egypt, who appointed him Governor of the Provinces of the Equatorial Lakes. He was next created a Pasha, and in February, 1877, he was appointed by the Khedive Governor of the whole of the Soudan. In the course of that year he traversed the whole of the pro-Consulate, settling difficulties, pacifying hostile tribes, changing local officials, gaining the love of the natives by his unswerving justice, and winning an almost superstitious admiration by the rapidity of his movements through the vast regions submitted to his rule. He put down a formidable revolt in Darfur, brought to an end a tedious war in Abyssinia, captured hundreds of slave caravans, and destroyed the power of the slave dealers at the very source of their supplies. Since then he has successfully carried out important missions in various parts of the world. The Soudanese were, however, never more than nominally subdued by Egypt and only waited for a favorable opportunity to throw off the yoke. Mr. Gladstone stated in the House of Commons that he would not withold his sympathy from these men in their struggle for freedom. Gordon's mission was avowedly pacific, and his journey performed without a military retinue, was in the interests of peace. He took with him an ample money credit, not for the uses of war, but really for a little judicious bribery. Before starting he insisted that he should be responsible to his own Government, not to the Khedive. After he had been out a little while a great change took place in his views, but exactly how it happened we do not know. He, however, consented to become the Viceroy of the Khedive, and thus proclaimed himself the enemy of all who disputed the Khedive's claim. The burning of all instruments of oppression at Khartoum seemed like the introduction of a new and better era. Soon after, the proclamation of the legitimacy of the slave trade which he had formerly done so much to destroy, gave us a shock. There were other things which he did which puzzle us. We await fuller light. Being on the spot he may have had perfectly justifiable reasons for his conduct. His change of view threw the Home Government into difficulties, though it may ultimately be found that this change was needful in order to the renovation and salvation both of Egypt and the Soudan.

This is not the first time that treachery has done its work in Eastern lands, though how Gordon should trust a man who had before proved unfaithful is a mystery. It may be that the Khartoum disaster has come to test the spirit and patriotism of this country. The greatness of a nation, like the greatness of an individual, is shown, not in moments of prosperity, but in moments of adversity. Nations have recovered from greater disasters. We have had no defeats in battle, nay, it seems to me that the magnificent march across the desert, the battles of Abu Klea and Metemneh, and the defense of Khartoum by Gordon, will add a few more pages of glory to our already glorious history. Whatever may be the faults and failings of our Government, it stands on the side of freedom, and order, and humanity, and it is hoped that in spite of all unpatriotic howls it will continue to stand in defence of all that is righteous and honorable.

LODGE OBSERVATIONS.

The skeleton used in the principal Odd-fellow's lodge of Indianapolis, Ind., during the last twenty years, was that of a young man, the son of a former sheriff of the county, who was murdered within half a square of Odd-fellow's hall. The widowed mother afterwards became a resident of Illinois. The following circumstance was related to me by an Odd-fellow, a resident of Indianapolis, but who had been connected with a lodge in an adjoining State. A lodge room with which he was connected was undergoing repairs. A careless workman permitted a plank to fall on the coffin, breaking the skeleton so badly that another was necessary. Three members of the lodge volunteered to supply the article. One of the trio was a physician, who had attended in her last illness a woman who had recently been buried. Her body was taken up, the skeleton prepared, and presented to the lodge, and the first man initiated over the new skeleton was the widowed husband. "Did the physician know that the husband would be initiated over his wife's skeleton?" I asked my informant: to which he gave an affirmative reply.

Under the caption, "Fragments of History," published in a Masonic periodical, by "John L. Lewis, 33rd degree," the statement is made that the Tatler for June 9, 1709, contains the expression, "They have their signs and tokens like Freemasons," from which John L. Lewis. 33rd degree, argues that the society existed previous to 1717, the year usually assigned for its birth by Anti-masons. Upon referring to a Boston edition of the Tatler, issued in 1856, I find that the words are correctly quoted. Attached to the book, however is the following: "Publisher's notice: this edition of Chalmer's British Essayists is an exact reprint of that published in London in 1823, edited with many corrections and improvements by an anonymous hand, (G. W.)" Now it is barely possible that the above reference to Freemasonry is one of G. W's. "improvements," and if the original edition of the Tatler were consulted, it would be found that Sir Richard Steele did not pen the expression attributed to him. Still it may be true thath Elias Ashmole, astrologer and antiquarian, who died in 1692, originated Freemasonry, and that it left the hands of Anderson and Desaguilers, in 1717, a very crude affair, consisting of one degree and one oath, and not till 1780 did craft Masonry assume its present form. Later still, Templar Scottish rite, Memphis rite, Adoptive (female), and Mohammedan Freemasonry have been invented, the votaries of which may be ready to swear, and possibly believe, that their favorite branch existed from time immemorial. The present editor of the Indianapolis Evening News, a Mason of many degrees, published an editorial in his paper at the time the obelisk was removed from Egypt to New York, in which he opposed the absurd claims of Freemasonry to antiquity, and attributed the origin of the society to Ashmole. R.

The adaptability of secretism to nefarious purposes is becoming more and more evident, and their power for good more and more questioned. That which is truly good needs not oath-bound secrecy to make it better, and that which is evil can be made far more evil by the aid of secrecy. Take the dynamite curse for an example. It cannot be made an instrument of devilish destruction without the hidden methods of secretism, nor on the other hand can the Gospel be made more useful by all the oath-bound orders of the world. It seems to be of the divine order that the Gospel to display its highest efficiency must be proclaimed in all the world and to every creature, whereas the cause of evil to be successful, must be carried on by ways that are dark, and by tricks that are mean.—Blanchard Record.

MORMONISM AND MOHAMMEDANISM.

BY H. J. EDDY, D.D.

[From the Baptist Weekly.]

As Mormonism originated near my native place, and as I knew the founders of it, I take the liberty to give your readers a statement of its origin.

In the neighborhood of Palmyra, Wayne county, a tramp, known as "Joe" Smith, pretended to possess "magic stones," which he put into the crown of his hat, into which he would look and tell the ignorant people where they could find lost articles. For this service he received small sums of money. It is alleged that, at a certain time, he correctly revealed the whereabouts of a lost cow in a wood, and that he was seen to take down the pasture fence one night and drive the cow into the forest. It was not a theft, but a plan to confirm his reputation as a seer.

Joseph Smith, with a few more like himself, pretended to find, what they denominated "Golden Plates, in the Hill Moreh," which, when its hyeroglyphics were translated, became the Mormon Bible. The "Hill Moreh" was in the township of Manchester, Wayne county, New York, about three miles south of Palmyra.

Associated with Smith were David Whitmar, Oliver Cowdry, Martin Harris and Sidney Rigdon. Rigdon was a broken-down lawyer who had returned to the printers' trade, and had been on a paper in Northern Pennsylvania.

The Rev. Solomon Spaulding, of New England, a Congregational minister, went with his wife to Pennsylvania to recruit his failing health. As a pastime, he wrote a romance in scripture style, assuming that the nations of the American continent are the lost tribes of Israel. He showed his work to the editor of the paper where Sidney Rigdon was employed. The editor wished to publish it, but Mr. Spaulding declined. Mr. Spaulding died and his widow returned to Boston. When she left she asked for her husband's manuscripts, but they could not be found. Rigdon had joined "Joe" Smith near Palmyra, and they pretended to dig in a hillside. I have seen the hole and find the "Golden Plates" inscribed with strange characters. Smith, by divine assistance, as he declared, translated the strange characters, after which they quickly vanished, golden plates and all. These facts I had from the lips of Martin Harris, who was one of the three witnesses who swore to the truth of the wonderful claims of Smith to be a prophet. Thus Mormonism originated.

Some years afterwards the Mormon Bible fell into the hands of Mrs. Spaulding, when she exclaimed with amazement, "This is my husband's lost manuscript."

The first Mormon Bible was printed in Palmyra, in the office of the Wayne Sentinel. Martin Harris mortgaged his farm to furnish the necessary funds. That book, a copy of which I have, condemned polygamy in the most decisive terms. When Brigham Young announced a revelation sanctioning polygamy, they endeavored to destroy the first Bible and published a new one with polygamous sanction. Joseph Smith's son, now at the head of the anti-polygamous Mormons, declares Brigham Young's statement, that the revelation sanctioning this vice was given by his father, is false.

The other feature of Mormonism which enables it to baffle all attempts against it, is the fact that it is a secret oath-bound society whose oaths nullify all oaths of allegiance and or testimony-bearing; and not only in the third or seventh degrees, but from the first, bind every initiate to conceal and never reveal any crime of the order or of its members, "murder and treason not excepted." The fact that many Christian men have been lured into the taking of such oaths in other secret orders, has hitherto condoned the crime and danger of their existence and prevalence; and it is not only just retribution but a divinely ordered means for the awakening of American Christians to the enormity of this secret wickedness that it has blossomed and fruited in the Mormon Endowment house, in Ku Klux Klans and other frauds and villainies with their "Most Illustrious Grand Master General of the Sovereign Sanctuary, U. S. A.," whether of the thirty-third, ninetieth or ninety-sixth degree of crime and imposture. Shame that such vain glorious titles can be sported, and such conspiracies against Christianity liberty and society can flourish with the sanction and participation of professed followers of the humble and lowly Jesus. No wonder that Mormon priests and dynamite fiends are allowed to rise up among us to inflict what every candid observer must call "Poetic Justice."—The Christian Nation.

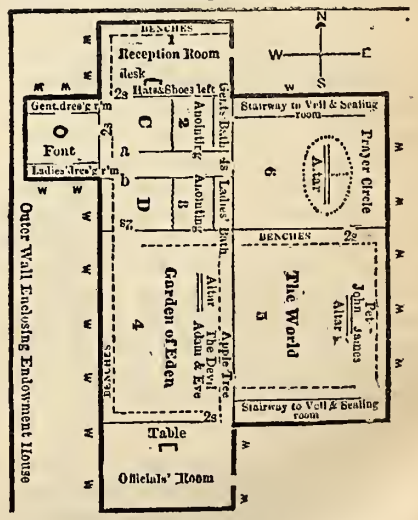
LIFTING THE VEIL.

THE MYSTERIES OF THE MORMON ENDOWMENT HOUSE FULLY EXPOSED.

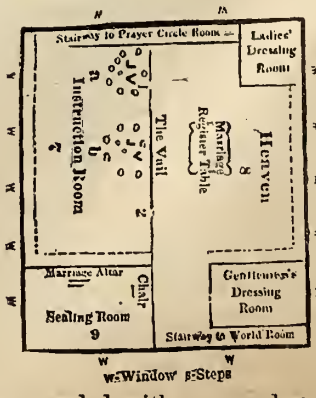
The Chicago Daily Tribune of October 11th, 1879, published a thrilling letter detailing and illustrating the ceremonies—blasphemous and disloyal—which take place in the Mormon Endowment House, on the initiation of men and women into the so-called church of the Latter Day Saints. Its sentiments are so clear and concise as to leave no doubt as to their truthfulness. It is written by a lady who has been through them all, and the amazing details will be read with the deepest interest.

The Mormon Endowment House is a plain, adobe building, two stories high, built like a small dwelling-house, so as not to attract attention. There are blinds to all the windows, which are nearly always kept down. It is situated in the northwest corner of the Temple Block (which includes the tabernacle, New Temple, etc.), and the whole block is surrounded by a very high wall.

On a certain day, not necessary to mention, I went to the Endowment House at 8 o'clock in the morning, taking with me my endowment clothes (consisting of garments, robe, cap, apron, and moccasins)



GARMENTS.



I believe people used to take their own oil, but that is now discontinued, as fees are charged. I went into a small room attached to the main building, (designated in the following plan by the name of Reception-room):

GROUND FLOOR OF ENDOWMENT HOUSE.

Outer Wall Enclosing Endowment House.

UPPER FLOOR OF ENDOWMENT HOUSE.

This was crowded with men and women, having their bundles of clothing. The entrance door is on the east side, and in the southwest corner; there is another next to which the desk stood, where the clerk recorded the names, etc. Around the north and west sides were benches for the people to sit.

On going up to the desk, I presented my recommend from the Bishop in whose ward I was staying, and George Reynolds, who was then acting as clerk, asked me my name, those of my parents, when and where I was born, and when I was baptized into the Mormon church.

That over, he told me to leave my hat, cloak and shoes in that room; and, taking up my bundle, I went into the room marked 3 on the plan, where I sat waiting until it came my turn to be washed.

THE WASHING.

One of the women, an officiating high priestess, told me to come behind the curtain (which I have indicated by a wave line,) where I could hear a good deal of splashing and subdued conversation. I went, and after I was undressed I had to step into a long bath about half full of water, when another woman proceeded to wash me I objected strongly to this part of the business, but was told to show a more humble spirit. However, when she got down to my feet she let me go, and I was turned over to the woman who had spoken to me first, and whose name was Bathsheba Smith (one of the widows of the Apostle George Smith). She wore a long shiny apron, and her sleeves tucked up above her elbows. She looked thoroughly like business.

THE ANOINTING.

Another woman was standing beside her with a large wooden spoon and some green olive oil in a cow's horn. This woman poured the oil out of the spoon into Bathsheba's hand, who immediately put it on my head, ears, eyes and mouth, and every part of my body, and as she greased me she uttered a kind of prayer over each member of my body: My head, that I might have a knowledge of the truths of God; my eyes, that I might see the glories of the kingdom; my mouth, that I might at all times speak the truth; my arms, that they might be strong in the defense of the Gospel; my bosom—and here I must ask the readers not to think I want to tell this part of the story, but I do want people to know the truth, and how disgusting and indelicate this thing is. Mormon people deny many of these things, and civilized and decent people can scarcely realize that this institution is as infamous as it really is, but I solemnly assert that these things do exist. To continue: My bosom, that I might nourish the children whom I might raise by my husband (I was not then married, but expected to be). And so she got down to my feet, when she hoped they might be swift in the paths of righteousness and truth.

She then turned me over to the woman who had washed me, and who whispered my new celestial name in my ear. I believe I am to be called up in the morning of the resurrection by it. It was "Sarah." I felt disappointed. I thought I should have received a more distinguished name. She told me that new name must never be spoken, but often thought of, to keep away evil spirits. I should be required to speak it once that day, but she would tell me in what part of the ceremony, and that I should never again have to speak it.

ENDOWMENT ROBES.

She then told me to put on my garments. These are made in one piece. On the right breast is a square, on the left a compass, in the center a small hole, which is called the "Stone." We were told that as long as we kept them on no harm could befall us, and that when we changed them we were not to take them all off at once, but slip out a limb at a time and immediately dive into the clean ones. The neck was never to be cut low, or the sleeves short, as that would be patterning after the fashions of the Gentiles.

APRON WORN BY MEN AND WOMEN.

After this I put on my clothes, and, in my stocking feet, waited with those who were washed and anointed until she had finished the remaining two or three. This done, the little calico curtains (marked A and B) were drawn aside, and the men and women stood revealed to each other. The men looked very uncomfortable, and not at all picturesque. They only had their garments and shirts on, and they really did seem as though they were ashamed of themselves, as they well might be.

THE WEAK-KNEED CAN BACK OUT.

Joseph F. Smith then came to where we were all waiting, and told us that if "we wanted to back out now was our time," because we should not be able afterward, and that we were bound to go right through. All those who wanted to go through were to hold up their hands, which, of course, every one did, believing that all the good and holy things that were to be seen and heard in the "House of the Lord" were yet to come. He then told us that if ever any of us attempted to reveal what we saw and heard in the "House" our memories would be blighted, and we should be everlastingly damned, for they were things too holy to be spoken of between each other, after we had once left the Endowment House. We were then told to be very quiet and listen. Joseph F. Smith then went away.

BLASPHEMOUS MUMMERIES.

In a few moments we heard voices talking loudly so that the people could hear them in the adjoining room. (I afterwards found out in passing through that it was the prayer-circle room.) It was supposed to be a conversation between Elohim (Head-God) and Jehovah. The conversation was as follows:

Elohim to Jehovah—"Well, Jehovah, I think we will create an earth; let Michael go down and collect all the elements together and found one."

Answer—"Very well, O Lord God, it shall be done."

Then, calling to another man, we could hear him say:

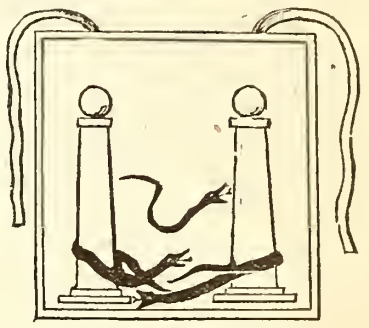
"Michael, go down and collect all the elements together and form an earth, and then report to us what you have done."

A.—"Very well, O Lord God."

The man they called Michael then left the prayer-circle room and came through the room they called the World, into the Garden of Eden,, the door of which was shut that faced the places C and D, where we were standing, listening and waiting. He remained there a second or two, and everything was quiet. At the end of that time we heard him going back the same way, to where Elohim and Jehovah were waiting. When he got back he said: "I have collected all the elements together and founded an earth; what wouldst thou have me do next?" Using the same formula every time they sent him down to the world, they then told him to separate the land from the water, light from darkness, etc., and so they went regularly through the creation, but they always told him to come up and report what he had done.

When the creation was supposed to be finished, Michael went back and told them it was very fair and beautiful to look upon. Elohim then said to Jehovah that he thought they had better go down and have a look at it, which they did, and agreed with Michael that it was a beautiful place; that it seemed a pity it should be of no particular use, but thought it would be a good idea to create man to live in it and cultivate these things.

They then came out of the Garden of Eden (which was supposed to have been newly finished), and, shutting the door after them, came to where we were standing. We were then told to shut our eyes, and Jehovah said to Michael, "Give me a handful of dust and I will create man." We were then told to open our eyes, and we saw a man that had been taken from the crowd, standing beside Jehovah, and to whom Jehovah said: "I will call thee Adam, for thou shalt be the father of all mankind." Jehovah said it was not good for man to be alone, so he would create a woman and a helpmeet for him. We were again told to close our eyes, and Adam was requested to go to sleep, which he obligingly did. Jehovah was then supposed to take a rib from Adam's side and form Eve. We were then told to open our eyes and look upon the handiwork of the Lord. When we did we saw a woman, taken from among the crowd, who was standing by Adam's side. Jehovah said he would call the woman Eve, because she would be the mother of all mankind.



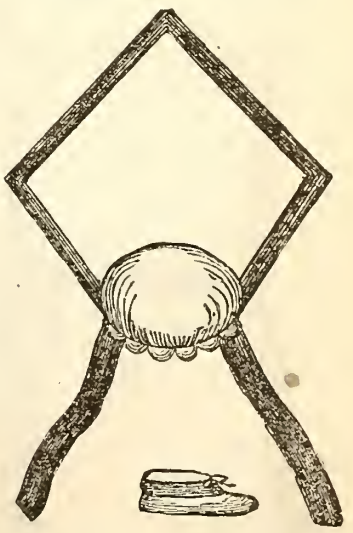
THE DOOR OF THE GARDEN OF EDEN

was then opened, and we all marched in with our little bundles—the men going first, as they always take precedence—and ranged ourselves round the room on benches. The four sides of this room are painted in imitation of trees, flowers, birds, wild beasts, etc. (The artist who painted the room was evidently more acquainted with whitewashing than painting.) The ceiling was painted blue, dotted over with golden stars; in the center of it was the sun, a little further along the moon, and all around were the stars. In each corner was a Masonic emblem. In one corner is a compass, in another the square, in the remaining two were the level and the plumb. On the east side of the room, next the door, was a painted apple-tree, and in the northeast part of the room, next the door, was a painted apple-tree, and in the northwest part of the room was a small wooden altar.

After we had seated ourselves, Jehovah told Adam and Eve that they should eat of every tree in the garden except of this particular apple-tree, for on the day that they ate of that they should surely die.

EATING THE APPLE.

He then took his departure, and immediately after in came a very lively gentleman, dressed in a plain black morning suit, with a little apron on, a most fiendish expression on his face, and joyfully rubbing his hands. This gentleman was supposed to be "the devil."



THE DEVIL'S APRON.

Certainly his appearance made the supposition quite easy (by the by, I have since seen the same gentleman administering the Sacrament in the Tabernacle on Sundays). He went up to Eve and remarked that it was a very beautiful place, and that the fruit was so nice, would she like to taste one of those apples. She demurred a little, and said she was told not to, and therefore musn't. But he pretended to pluck one of the painted apples, and gave it to her, and she pretended to eat it. He then told her to ask Adam to have some, and she did. Adam objected strongly to tasting, knowing the penalty, but Eve eventually overcame his scruples, saying: "Oh, my dear, they're so nice, you haven't any idea, and that nice old gentleman there (pointing to the devil) says that he can recommend them and you need not be afraid of what Jehovah says."

Adam consented, and immediately after he said, "Oh, what have I done, and how foolish I was to listen to you." He then said he could see himself, and that they had no clothes on, and they must sew some fig-leaves together. Every one then made a dive for his apron out of the little bundles. This apron is a square half-yard of green silk with nine fig-leaves worked on it in brown sewing silk. A voice was then heard calling for Adam, who pretended to hide, when in came Jehovah. He gave Adam a good scolding, but finally told him that he would give him certain instructions, whereby he would have a chance to regain the presence of his Father and God after he was driven out into the world. These instructions consisted of grips, etc., and the garments he wore would protect him from all evil. (Mormons say of these garments that the pattern was revealed direct from Heaven to Joseph Smith, and are the same as were originally worn by Adam.)

They then put on

the women's caps being made of Swiss muslin; it is one yard square, rounded at one corner so as to fit the head, and there are strings on it which tie under the chin. The moccasins are made of linen or calico. The men's caps are exactly like those of pastry cooks, with a bow on the right side.

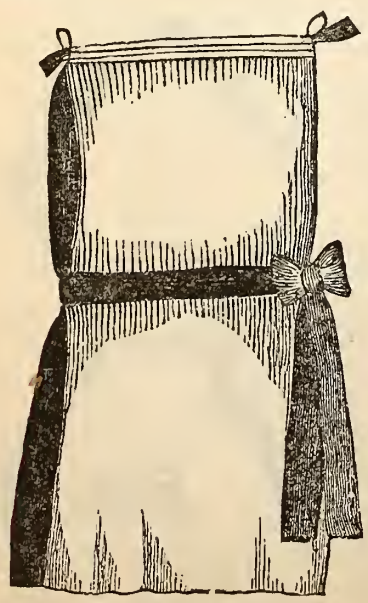
MEN'S CAP.

I should here mention, before I go further, that Bethsheba Smith and one of the priests enacted the parts of Adam and Eve, and so stood sponsors for the rest of us, who were individually supposed to be Adams and Eves.

THE ENDOWMENT OATHS.



They then proceeded to give us the first grip of the Aaronic or Lesser Priesthood, which consists of putting the thumb on the knuckle of the index finger, and clasping the hands round. We were then to swear "To obey the laws of the Mormon Church and all they enjoin, in preference to those of the United States." The penalty for revealing this grip and oath is that you will have your throat cut from ear to ear, and your tongue torn from your mouth, and the sign of the penalty is drawing the hand with the hand pointing toward the throat sharply and bringing the arm to the level of the square, and, with the hand upraised to Heaven, swearing to abide the same.

MORE TOMFOOLERY.

We were then driven out of this into the room called the World, where there were three men standing at a small altar on the east side of the room, who were supposed to represent Peter, James, and John, Peter standing in the center. He was supposed to have the keys of Heaven. Men representing (or trying to) the different religious sects then came in and presented their views and they wanted to try and save those fallen children. In doing this they could not refrain from exaggerating and coarsely satirizing the different sects they represented. Previous to their coming in, however, Peter presented to us the Gospel of Christ—at least he told us that Christ had come to die for the original sin, but that we had got to work out our own salvation, and that in the last days a prophet should be raised up to save all those who would believe in his divine commission; consequently these different represpntatives were told that their doctrines did not suit the people and that there was something wanting in their faith and so they could not go. The devil came in and tried to allure the people, and bustling up to the altar, Peter said to him: "Halloo, Mr. Devil, how do you do to-day? It's a very fine day, isn't it? What have you come after?" The Devil replied that he didn't seem to take to any of these so-called Christian religions, why didn't they quit bothering after any thing of the kind, and live a life of pleasure, etc. However he was told to go, and that quickly.

POLYGAMY ENJOINED.

Peter then gave the second grip of the Aaronic or Lesser Priesthood, which consists of putting the thumb between the knuckles of the index and second fingers and clasping the hand around. The penalty for revealing this is to be sawn asunder, and our members to be cast into the sea. The sign of the penalty was drawing the hand sharply across the middle of the body. To receive that grip we had to put on our robes, which consisted of a long, straight piece of cloth reaching to our feet, doubled over and gathered very full on the shoulder and round the waist.

THE ROBES.

There was also a long narrow piece of cloth tied around the waist called "the sash." It was placed on the right shoulder to receive this grip. The people wore their aprons over it. The men then took the oath of chastity and the women the same; they do not consider polygamy at all unchaste, but said that it was a heaven-ordained law, and that a man to be exalted in the world to come must have more than one wife. The women then took the oath of obedience to their husbands, having to look up to them as their gods. It is not possible for a woman to go to Christ, except through her husband.

Then a man came in and said that the Gospel (which during those few minutes' intervals had lain dormant for 1,800 years) had been again restored to earth, and that an angel had revealed it to a young boy named Joseph Smith, and that all the gifts, blessings, prophecies of old had been restored with it, and this last revelation was to be called the Latter-Day Dispensation. The priests pretended joyfully to accept this, and said it was the very thing they were in search of, nothing else having had the power to satisfy them.

MORE SIGNS AND GRIPS.

Then they proceeded to give us the first grip of the Melchizedek or Higher Priesehood, which is said to be the same that Christ held. The thumb is placed on the index finger, and the index finger is placed straight across the palm of the hand, while the lower part of the hand is clasped with the remaining fingers. The robe for this grip was changed from the right to the left shoulder. We were then made to swear to avenge the death of Joseph Smith, the martyr, together with that of his brother, Hyrum, on this American Nation, and that we would teach our children and our children's children to do so. The penalty for revealing this oath and grip was disembowelment.

We were then marched into the north-east room (the men, of course, always going first) designated the prayer-circle room. We were here made to take an oath of

OBEDIENCE TO THE MORMON PRIESTHOOD.

And now the highest or grand grip of the Melchizedek priesthood was given. We clasped each other round the hand with the point of the index finger resting on the wrist, and little fingers firmly linked together. The place on the wrist where the index points is supposed to be the place where Christ was nailed to the cross, but they tore out and he had to be nailed again, and so you place your second finger beside the index on the wrist; it is called the

SURE SIGN OF THE NAIL,

and if the grip is properly given, it is very hard to pull apart. The robe was changed from the left to the right shoulder to receive this grip.

The men then formed a circle round the altar, linking their arms straight across, and placing their hands on one another's shoulders. The priest knelt at the altar and took hold of one the men's hands and prayed. He told us that an electric current of prayer passed through that circle, and that was the most efficacious kind of prayer. The women stood outside the circle with their veils covering their faces, the only time throughout the ceremony that they did so.

The prayer over, they all trooped up the staircase on the north side of the house, into the room called the Instruction Room, where the people sat down on the west side of the room. Facing them about midway between floor and ceiling, was a wooden beam that went across the room from north to south, and from which was suspended a dirty looking piece of what was once white calico. This was called "the Veil," and is supposed to be in imitation of the one in Solomon's Temple. On this veil are marks like those on the garments together with extra holes for putting the arms through, and a hole at the top to speak through. But, before going through the veil, we received a general outline of instructions we had received down stairs. This over, the priest took a man to the veil to one of the openings, (marked 1), where he knocked with a small wooden mallet that hung on the wooden support. A voice on the other side of the veil (it was supposed to be Peter's) asked who was there, when the priest, answering for the man, said: "Adam having been faithful desires to enter." The priest then led the man up to the west side of the veil, where he had to put his hands through and clasp the man, or Peter (to whom he whispers his new name, and the only one he ever tells, for they never tell their celestial names to their wives, although the wives must tell theirs to their husbands) through the holes in the veil. He was then allowed to go through to the other side, which was supposed to be heaven, and this is where a strong imagination might be of some use, for anything more unlike heaven I can't conceive. The man having got through, he went to the opening (No. 2), and told the gate-keeper to call for the woman he was about to marry, telling him her name. She then stepped up to the veil where the marks "B" are. They could not see each other, but put their hand through the openings, one of their hands on each other's shoulder and the other around the waist. (The marks on the plan at the sides are for the arms, and all the marks in the plan on the veil are exactly as they are in the Endowment House. The top round mark is the place where they spoke through, and the square, compass, and stone correspond with the marks on the garments. the two bottom marks were where the feet were put through). With the arms so fixed the knees were placed within each other, the feet of course being the same, the woman's given name was then whispered through the veil, then her new and celestial name, then the priestess who stood by to instruct the women, told them to repeat after her a most disgusting formula or oath. I cannot remember it all thoroughly, but what I do consists of "the heart and the liver, the belly and the thighs, the marrow and the bone." The last and highest grip of the Melchizedek priesthood was then given through the veil.

They then released their hold of each other, and the priestess, taking the woman to opening No. 2, knocked the same as they did at the men's entrance, and the gate-keeper, having asked, "Who is there?" and the priestess having replied, "Eve, having been faithful in all things, desires to enter," Eve was accordingly ushered into Heaven.

MORMON THEOLOGY EXPLAINED.

Before I go farther, I must tell how they believe the entrance into Heaven is to be gained on the morning of the resurrection. Peter will call up the men and women (for it is not possible for a woman to be resurrected or exalted, or to be made a Queen in Heaven, unless some man takes pity on her and raises her). If the marks on the garments are found to correspond with those on the veil (the dead are buried in the whole paraphernalia), if you can give the grips and tokens, and your new name, and are dressed properly in your robes, why, then, one has a sure permit to Heaven, and will pass by the angles (who they suppose are to be only ministering servants) to a more exhalted glory; the more wives they have, they think, the higher their glory will be.

THE SEALING PROCESS.

To resume: After we got through, we saw Joseph F. Smith sitting at a table recording the names of those who were candidates for marriage. He wrote the names in a book (the existence of which marriage register this truthful apostle has since denied, so that a polygamous marriage might not be found out) and then he wrote the two names on a slip of paper, to be taken into the sealing-room to the officiating priest, so that he might know whom he was marrying. After having given this slip to the priest (Daniel H. Wells) we knelt at a little wooden altar (they were all alike in the Endowment House). He then asks the man if he is willing to take the woman to wife, and the woman if she is willing to take him for a husband. They both having answered yes, he tells the man he must look to God, but the woman must look to her husband as her God, for if he lives his religion, the spirit of God will be in him, and one must therefore yield him unquestionable obedience, for he as a god unto her, and then concludes by saying that, he having authority from on high to bind and loose her here upon earth, and whatsoever he binds here shall be bound in Heaven seals the man and woman

FOR TIME AND ALL ETERNITY.

He then tells the man and woman to kiss each other across the altar, the man kneeling on the north side and the woman on the south, and so it is finished. Sometimes they have witnesses, sometimes not; if they think any trouble may arise from a marriage, or that the woman is inclined to be a little perverse, they have no witnesses; neither do they give marriage certificates, and, if occasion requires it, and it is to shield any of their polygamous brethren from being found out, they will positively swear that they did not perform any marriage at all, so that the women of this church have but a very poor outlook for being considered honorable wives.

When the marriage ceremony was over we came out of the "sealed-room," and I crossed "Heaven" into the ladies' dressing-room, where, after having dressed and my husband paid the fees, we took our departure, together with that of the "Holy Spirit."

REFLECTIONS.

It was 3:30 p. m. when we left, I having gone there at 8 o'clock in the morning. You can probably imagine how fatigued one feels after listening patiently all the time to their incessant talking. Certainly at the end of the time one feels more like taking in nourishment than listening to the promptings of the "Holy Spirit." I should perhaps have remarked before that the priests, when going through the house, wear their ordinary clothing, and come straight into the "House of the Lord" with their dirty top boots on, as though they had just come off a farm, while we poor sinners were obliged to walk in our stocking feet lest the floor should be defiled.

The little addition attached to the main building on the west side, and in which the font is, is used for rebaptizing people before they can be allowed to go through the house, and is quite a separate affair from the washing and anointing; people are generally baptized a day or two before they go through the house. I was baptized the night before. On this same evening, I was told as I was going through the "House of the Lord" on the following day I must pay the very strictest attention to everything I should see and hear, as it would be for my benefit hereafter. I was obedient in that respect, for I remembered everything that happened as vividly as though it were yesterday, and if it has not been for my benefit, I hope that this article may prove of some use in warning and enlightening people as to jargon, and mummery that goes on in that most sacred "House of the Lord." MRS. G. S. R.

BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS:

BY E. E. FLAGG, AUTHOR OF "HOLDEN WITH CORDS."

CHAPTER XIII.

Nelson's arrest caused much excitement in Mrs. McGowan's quiet boarding house, and fell on Martha like a thunderbolt. But if she was not exactly a heroine, she had the stuff in her of which heroines are made, and she neither wept nor fainted when Martin Treworthy told her the news, but exclaimed indignantly:

"It is all a wicked plot. His opposition to the strike has made him enemies among the workmen, and they have laid this scheme to revenge themselves on him, and turn off suspicion from the real criminal."

"But, you see Nelson has been fool enough to join a secret clan, and from their point of view the wretches who actually put the dynamite in the building and perilled scores of lives were guilty of nothing worse than 'imprudence' and have got to be 'shielded from the consequences' some way or other. Nelson has incurred their hate by opposing the strike and opposing the leaders, and he can fill up the gap as well as any other innocent man; under the circumstances maybe a little better."

"Oh, can it be that God will let Nelson suffer under such a wicked accusation—so absurdly false on its very face!" burst out Martha. Whereat Martin Treworthy cut short his growling, and essayed to comfort her with that kind of advice which, however trite and commonplace it may seem, has comforted people in trouble in all ages.

"Keep fast hold on your trust in God. Don't let that slip. Anchor your heart right on to his promise, 'He shall bring forth thy righteousness like the light, and thy judgment like the noonday.' That is the best way to do now. It is all coming out right. Why, bless you, there ain't anybody believes him guilty. The only witness against him whose testimony amounts to anything is a worthless fellow who would sell his soul for a drink of whisky. That young Howland says there ain't a jury in the land would indict him on such evidence. He'll come out all clear from this—but—"Martin Treworthy spoke the last words in the slow way in which he always uttered his strange half-prophecies that were the more impressive from the fact of their being so often couched in Scriptural language—"the end is not yet."

To Martha they sounded like the echo of her own unvoiced forebodings, and struck a chill to her very heart. But she asked no questions.

Stephen Howland had felt more than a passing interest in the young workman who had been his first client in Jacksonville, and undertook his defence with much ardor as a case even better suited to his chivalrous temper than prosecuting rumsellers.

The torn fragment of paper found where the dynamite was deposited was a part of a letter with Nelson's name attached; but Stephen's quick, judicial sense saw at once that all this "circumstantial evidence" if it proved anything proved too much, as the real criminal would in all probability have covered up his tracks better; while under his sharp cross examination the miserable fellow who had been hired to perjure himself became involved in hopeless contradictions, and finally broke down at a point where he testified to having recognized Nelson on a certain occasion, the hour being late in the evening, by the light of the moon; a statement which the almanac failed to verify, as Stephen, after due examination of that important authority, quietly informed the jury.

Nothing now remained but to sum up in one brief and powerful argument all the facts in the case, which proved a conspiracy to criminate his client on the part of some members of the Union who were dissatisfied with his course in relation to the strike. The evidence was so overwhelming that Nelson was triumphantly cleared of the charge without the jury leaving their seats.

In the course of his speech Stephen incidentally remarked, "I believe fully in the right of laboring men to organize for their own better protection, but when these secret organizations become engines of intimidation and terrorism, and fetter personal liberty, they are a nuisance to the world and the greatest possible curse to labor;" and in doing so he merely expressed an opinion which he supposed would be shared as a matter of course by every good, intelligent citizen. In his own mind it really seemed like a very innocent and well-turned sentence, and decidedly apropos to the defence, but Mr. Basset, who had dropped in to hear the proceedings of the court, as soon as it was over made him aware of his mistake.

"It won't do now to condemn the secret trades unions for the rash acts of a few. It will be likely to hurt your practice if you say such things. So many Masons and Odd-fellows belong to these societies that there's a kind of connection, you see. And besides you are likely, unaware, to hurt the feelings of a brother, and so go contrary to that rule of charity which is such a fundamental principle with all true Odd-fellows."

It did not occur to Stephen that if he fully carried out this rule and never said or did anything that could by any possibility hurt the feelings of Masons or Odd-fellows, it would effectually prevent him from making another speech against the saloon business as long as he lived. But Mr. Basset's glorification of his favorite order upon all possible occasions had begun to slightly pall upon his taste, and it did strike him as an unpleasant idea that there should be any link between him and dynamiters—which he was on the point of dryly observing when he saw Martin Treworthy a little distance off, his rugged features in a glow of delight, and turned away rather abruptly to go and shake hands with him.

The old soldier with his odd mingling of various and seemingly opposite characters, who had fought and suffered for the cause of human liberty, in those days already as much a part of history to the generation to which Stephen belonged as Bunker Hill or Valley Forge, had made a strong impression upon his fancy on the occasion of the former trial, and he was glad of this opportunity to renew his acquaintance. But the greeting he received from the old border hero was decidedly more confusing than Mr. Basset's.

"That was good—the way you come down on these unions. God bless you, and give you the chance to hit the whole brood of secret orders a good many such raps."

Poor Stephen felt himself in an awkward dilemma, but the Howland honesty came to his rescue, and he said, while the blood rushed uncomfortably to his face, "I fear you misunderstood me, Mr. Treworthy. My remark was not intended to condemn all secret societies, or even the trades unions further than their tyrannical abuse of power. I am an Odd-fellow," he added hesitatingly, "but I trust I am a good citizen for all that. I no more believe in any society which tries the dynamite argument, or restricts personal liberty, than I do in rum-selling, and should feel that it was just as much my duty to fight it."

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE BLANCHARD CONVENTION.

BLANCHARD, Iowa, March 3, 1885.

EDITORS CYNOSURE:—A National Reform Convention was held in the U. P. church here, February 24 and 25. Among the speakers were Bro. Wm. Johnston, of College Springs, Rev. D. McKee, of Clarinrinda, Elder R. Smith, of Maryville, Rev. J. Teas, of Brooklyn, N. Y.; brothers R. M. Sherrard and Rufus Johnson, of Blanchard, and others.

We are glad to say that these brethren are all sound on the anti-secret issue. They wasted no time. We held three sessions. The sleighing and moonlight were good and the house well filled. A local organization was formed by electing J. R. Sharp, president; Rev. R. Johnson, secretary; and T. G. Crooks, treasurer.

The convention was radical on all reform issues. We ran the plough to the beam, and turned up secretists, rumists, liberalists, anarchists, nihilists, communists, socialists, dynamitists, etc. There is a sense, Mr. Editor, in which this National reform issue goes deeper than any other reform organization. Compare it, for example, with the American party, whose special plank is that the oaths of Masonry and other secret societies be prohibited by law. The National reform movement is in full sympathy with this plank, but it goes farther and claims that before this plank can be carried, we must correct a fundamental error in our Constitution, which puts all religion on a level. Masonry is a religion. The best authorities inside and outside of the lodge have proved this. The first amendment of the Constitution says that Congress shall make no law respecting establishment of religion, or "prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

The fifth plank in the American platform aims to prohibit the Masonic religion, and is a plain violation of the Constitution. Thus the American party is unconstitutional. Again, the Constitution says, Article 6: "No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States." This is one of the terms of the contract, to which every citizen is bound by oath. We must not refuse at the ballot-box to vote for a candidate because of his religion. Masonry is a religion, therfore, the Constitution forbids us to object to a man at the ballot-box, because he is a Mason. The aim of the National reform movement is to warn the people of this serious defect of the Constitution. We are working for the success of the anti-secret party, and the Prohibition party, and the anti-Mormon party. The evils against which these parties are organized, are entrenched behind the Constitution. We must dislodge them from this bulwark. We must make the Constitution speak out decidedly on the side of God and Christianity, and against all false religions. M. A. GAULT.

WILL HE RENOUNCE?

OPEN LETTER TO EX-GOV. J. P. ST. JOHN.

SABETHA, Kan., Feb. 13, 1885.

Honorable John P. St. John:

DEAR SIR and BROTHER:—I have had the honor to vote and work for your election three times, if my memory does not err. The last time I never was so vilified; but I stood by the polls all day urging the ticket—straight prohibition with yourself and Daniel at the head of it, and Phillips for governor, for I cannot vote, unless it be as I pray. Recognizing the fact that yours is a mind of the keenest perception, therefore it approximates a work of supererogation, if such a work be possible, to call your attention to the incompatibility of oath-bound penal secrecy with the discharge of the duties of American citizenship and especially those duties pertaining to membership in the church of Jesus Christ.

A simple comparison of the covenant of the lodge to the entering apprentice, Master Mason and the twenty-first landmark of Masonry is sufficient to illustrate the invalidity of such obligations, while their effect on the judicial proceedings of our country subverts justice and is diabolical in the extreme. Therefore, in behalf of a very respectable portion of your former majorities, permit me to direct your attention to the fifth plank of the American party's platform. Should you endorse this plank, you can certainly count on the same support in future. I would not cast such a reflection on your intelligence as to assure you that Freemasonry is thoroughly exposed, for I am certain that you know this fact. Therefore, as "it is a fraud to conceal a fraud" and as Freemasonry is the most gigantic fraud of the age, it follows that such a reflection would only be surpassed by the insinuation that you possess neither the moral sense to endorse this plank, nor the grace to repudiate the system to which it stands opposed. "For God shall bring every work into judgment with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil."

Believe me, we are your friends and have been all through. And we have neither threats to compel you to pledge yourself to this issue nor promises if you ignore and reject it. In short, we trust that we can cast our next presidential ballots for President, John P. St. John, seceded Royal Arch Mason. You then will reach the climax of your accumulated iniquities and complete the list of your enviable appelations in being pronounced "a perjured villain." Very cordially yours,

GEO. T. DISSETTE, Seceded Master Mason.

THE FREEDMEN'S ACADEMY, DUNLAP, KAN.

Dunlap, Kan., Feb. 24, 1885.

Editor Christian Cynosure:—The character and nature of our work at Dunlap is entirely a missionary work, supported in part by the Associate Presbyterian church, and in part by the contribution of friends of the freedmen. The freedmen's Academy is situated here, with Mr. Andrew Atchison as principal, with three other teachers, two of whom are white and one colored, together with a missionary minister and music teacher, vocal and instrumental, also an industrial department with Mrs. L. P. Fulton, as matron. Our work is much admired and highly appreciated by all who are acquainted with its nature and character, whether of this vicinity or persons who have visited from different parts, of whom there are not a few.

The readers of the Cynosure cannot but know that the school is purely anti-secret, when they reflect that this is the place where Bro. Starry was mobbed and came near losing his life. It was through our influence that he came here. His mission certainly was a good one; for, as I have before stated, when that stone struck him on the cheek, Masonry received a blow from the hand of God, as it were, from which it has never recovered, and we think never will, or at least hope so, and we think we have abundant reason to feel so.

Let me state a remarkable fact. The men who attacked Mr. Starry, and threatened his life so dreadfully, are all under God's curse. The white Methodist minister is silenced from preaching, the Baptist (colored) minister has been driven from his place under charge of theft, another, a druggist and M. D., has been locked out from business for some crime. The post master is just about to lose his office, and the principal of the white school is none behind the others in guilt, and we feel pretty well assured he will lose his position. Thus we see God's dealings with them for their dreadful and murderous conduct. Let us pray God that they may be led to see their guilt and to repentance.

We have now an opening to work which before we did not have, and we are trying to improve it. I think we can very soon organize an anti-secret society. We have sent seventy-one subscribers to the remonstrance in the Cynosure, at the dedication of the monument, and have distributed almost one-hundred of Thurlow Weed's letters on Morgan's abduction, and quite a number of "Freemasonry at a Glance," all of which certainly, are tokens of good to the cause. Our workers are all deeply interested in the reforms of the present day, and especially so in the anti-secret and temperance cause, and I am sure our influence is being felt through the community.

We have a reading room and large circulating library (which is a donation from friends entirely) in which are two or three anti-secret works, and lately we have been asked several times for some more books on this subject, but did not have them, and we felt truly sorry to think people wanted more light, seemingly, and could not get it.

Now could not some friend or friends donate enough money to the Cynosure office to send us the five-dollar library advertised in their columns? By so doing they will certainly further the speed of the Gospel, by enabling these poor, ignorant, benighted souls, to get their understanding enlightened, and their consciences purged from the evils of secretism, and also enable us to strengthen the cause here, where we are laboring, as it were, almost under persecutions.

Mrs. C. M. Snodgrass.

DON'T DIVIDE THE PROHIBITION RANKS.

W. Salamanca, N. Y., March 2, 1885.

Dear Cynosure:—I am one of the few yet in the flesh, who voted for William Wirt, the first Anti-masonic candidate for President and I have been an enthusiastic anti-secretist ever since 1826. I heartily endorse the platform of the American party, and have voted for all its national candidates. But I am pained by the position taken by Dorcas and a few others, and endorsed by you. That the prohibition house was "divided against itself" has ever been a grief to me. How glad I was last Autumn, when it united on St. John. "My soul did magnify the Lord!" In 1883, while distributing Cynosure tracts I saw Mr. St. John; I opened my heart to him on the subject of division in our ranks as prohibitionists. He was not one then, only a submissionist, but he readily sympathized and encouraged the hope that the division would be healed. This was happily effected when the American party indorsed the nominations of the Prohibition party. Mr. St. John had given, in word and in deed, evidence enough, that he is an anti-secretist, to convince all, except the stupid and the stubborn. But now, since having accepted the evidence as satisfactory, by voting for him as our candidate, with no reason to suspect that his views have undergone an unfavorable change, Dorcas and you, and a few others, threaten to desert him, unless by a public denunciation, he will render himself so odious to prohibition secretists, as to drive them from his support. In this case there will certainly be two prohibition parties to neutralize one another. I know of many who belong to secret orders, that pray, and labor, and give, and VOTE for prohibition. They are willing that others be anti-secretists, but they do not wish to be denounced. They are satisfied with St. John, knowing that in principle and practice he is an anti, but if he should make an onslaught upon them, it would so disgust them, as to repel them from him.

Without doubt in my mind it is your Christian duty to speedily relieve him of the promise which you say you have exacted of him. At present he stands well with both wings of prohibitionists—let him alone. Let us work and vote and pray in and for the triumph of the American party, so unostentatiously as to win, rather than repel any and all who are with us on the subject of prohibition, but not on the subject of secretism. If the counsels of Dorcas prevail to separate real prohibitionists again, I will go, not alone, with the catholic party.

Yours for reason, truth and righteousness.

William Hall.

THE TOBACCO CURSE.

The indications are encouraging concerning the tobacco traffic, though it rules its victims with worse than a "rod of iron."

On the streets and by-ways of cities, villages, and country, are posters small and large, calling the attention of its hungry horde of patrons and all others, of the different grades, etc., of the accursed weed, such as, "Red Cross," "Elephant," "Hub Plug," and a host of other senseless names. And on the street cars I have noticed a conspicuous poster thus: "Cocoa tobacco not injurious to health."

Now the devil seldom comes so near as that to "telling on himself," for the statement quoted above is an admission that tobacco, of itself, is injurious to health.

Know this, all ye tobacco users, that you not only pay for the tobacco used, but also for all these expensive advertisements and costly boxes, large and small, and costly machinery, and traveling agents to sell you—what? Nourishing food? or any thing worth the money you pay for it? Far from it. To sell you a weed, a poisonous, an infernal weed, nay, more, a curse.

But now for the encouragement. When any evil enterprise or business is driven to so many ridiculous modes of advertising, and to such senseless extremes to maintain an existence, it is nearing its final end, because it is losing its hold on its patrons and feels it, and every such advertisement advertises its approaching end. The Lord hasten it.

Bible Lessons.

LESSON XII.—March 22, 1885.—Paul vindicated. Acts 26: 19-32.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Having therefore obtained help of God, I continue unto this day. Acts 26: 22.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. Help from God comes only in the path of obedience. vs. 19-23. Every revelation of duty to our souls is "a heavenly vision," to which we as free agents may be obedient or disobedient. The reason that so many men and women live selfish, useless lives is not because they have never received a call to God's service. He places before every soul good and evil. In the examples of the good and great in all ages, and above all in the pattern left us by his Son, the ideal of a grand unselfish life is flashed upon us, and our first duty is obedience to the heavenly vision. It may cost us the loss of all things as it did Paul. He might have been among the chief rulers of his nation instead of standing before them a despised captive; but he preferred ostracism, peril and persecution, and judged by a worldly standard even, who shall say his choice was not a wise one? The fame of Paul the Apostle has filled the ages, but the name of Saul, the persecutor, would not have survived his generation. It was a work of the most formidable difficulty and hardship to which the vision called him—no less than to sow the seeds of a new and hated religion through the whole Gentile world, and this in the face of old and established forms of worship supported by all the wealth and power of the upper class and the ignorance and superstitions of the lower. "But having obtained help of God, I continue unto this day," is his noble testimony. Yet if he had shrank from the path of trial and danger with the coward's plea that he was too weak for such a work, he could have borne no such witness to the Lord's power and faithfulness. It is only in the straight-forward path of obedience that we can raise for every milestone an Ebenezer and sing, "Hitherto hath the Lord helped me."

2. Worldly men have different ways of rejecting the truth. vs. 24-28. Saints, martyrs, reformers have in all periods been thought to be beside themselves by the materialistic and worldly, who cannot understand devotion to an idea or suffering endured for a principle. To them it is simply incomprehensible. Anti-secretists are now considered fanatics by many people who cannot see that the reform they advocate involves the honor of Christ, the safety of government, and the very life of religion. Other generations will give them credit for speaking the words of truth and soberness. There was a time when temperance people were so regarded. That time has to a great extent passed; the cause has gained popular recognition, but it is only because its first advocates were willing to be considered "fools for Christ's sake." Agrippa is also unbelieving, but he answers in words that properly translated are light and bantering, if not sneering. Paul had need of all his sublime faith in his mission before such an audience, but grandly he rises to the occasion, embracing his unbelieving judges in the largest Christian desire for their eternal good. It is only in such a spirit that a sneering, truth-rejecting world can be conquered for Jesus.

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

Did Christ himself once suffer under the same charge applied by Felix to Paul? Matt. 3: 21. What is the reason the world cannot understand Christian self-devotion? 1 Cor. 2: 14. Is it not then an entering into fellowship with his sufferings when reformers are called fanatics for Christ's sake?

"The king arose, and the governor, and Beatrice." To close an audience which was growing painful. The one redeeming fact in Beatrice's history may be due to the impression made upon her this day by St. Paul. It is known that about A. D. 65 she prevented a cruel massacre of the Jews in Jerusalem by interceding for them with Justus Flavius. Her character, however, was such that even in those evil days she was considered scandalous. It was impossible for such noble words and dignified bearing to fail in some effect, and in this case the Apostle's judges declare once again, "This man doeth nothing worthy of death, or of bonds." v. 32. Agrippa signifies his belief that he should be at once set at liberty. The legal difficulty of the appeal to Cæsar would, however, prevent this. None but a Roman citizen could so appeal, and after this he could be judged by no lower tribunal. The promise of our Lord to St. Paul, made two years before, as the Holy Spirit comforted him, that he should "bear witness also at Rome" (Acts 23: 11), was fulfilled through the very agencies by which the Jews sought to ruin him. As a prisoner under the charge of the Roman guard, he will make the journey to Rome, and this very evil of a prisoner's fate will thus become his safe conduct to the "home where he would be."—Illustrator.

THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

George Washington was born February 22, 1732, and died Dec. 14, 1799, aged 67 years, 9 months and 22 days. As early as 1783 Congress voted to erect an equestrian statue of Washington, but it was not done and ten days after his death another vote was given to erect a marble monument in his honor. But the project slumbered until 1833, when a monument society was formed an $1 contributions solicted. In this manner $37,000 was collected, and July 4, 1848, the corner-stone of the monument was laid. During six succeeding years it rose 152 feet at a cost of $230,000 from subscriptions. It was not until after the war that Congress took the project in hand and appropriated in succeeding years in all $900,000 for the completion of the monument. Its total cost was $1,187,710.

In form the monument is an obelisk, and rises to the height of 555 feet above its floor, or 574 feet above the level of the surrounding land, and 597 feet above low-water mark in the Potomac river, on the north bank of which it stands. The largest of the Egyptian obelisks is small compared with this. At the base the walls are over 15 feet thick, and the interior 25 feet square; at a height of 500 feet the walls are only 1½ feet thick, while the interior space is 31 feet square. The interior is lighted by electric lights, and an elevator renders it easy for the visitor to gain the look-out at the top. There is also an iron stairway of 900 steps. The outside walls are of Maryland marble; the inside for nearly 500 feet of New England granite. The total weight of the monument is 81,120 tons, or 162,240,000 pounds. It was originally intended to build the monument 600 feet high, but this was deemed unsafe owing to the great weight of the material. Each State in the Union sent a block of stone to be set in the interior, and many cities as well as foreign countries did likewise. These contributions, highly polished and elegantly inscribed, make the monument a museum of mineralogical curiosities. The dedication of the monument on the 23d ult. was attended by about a dozen lineal descendants of Washington. It was received on behalf of the United States and dedicated by President Arthur and an interesting feature of the occasion was the reading of an oration by Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, who was the orator at the laying of the corner-stone in 1848.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.
2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.
3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.
4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.
5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.
7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.
8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.
9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.
10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.
11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.
12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.
13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.
14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.
15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

The Christian Cynosure.

Editors.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, MARCH 12, 1885.

It is amazing that the church, ministry, and people, do not see that there are but two systems on this earth, Christ's and Satan's; that the secret lodge system belongs to Satan, and that the lodge which has the huge temples, is the mother, nurse, and ruler of the rest.

The Washington Protest, so far as we have seen in our large list of exchanges, has met with condemnation by no respectable sheet. While the arrogance, folly and absurdity of the Masonic performance is, we think, generally condemned by the press. This is a gain. But we must remember that all sin is folly, and all pagan rites are foolish. Yet they are the mightiest force to manage mind on this earth. Folly and absurdity are no objection to heathenism, or to idolatry in Christian countries. Senator Sherman and the monument commission placed Masonry on the programme by the authority of the United States. This is terribly disastrous. Suppose polygamy had reeeived the same Government recognition! The land would have turned pale!

The Toledo Blade still retains its Damascus steel. It went strong for Blaine; but the magnificent St. John vote in Ohio, with subsequent "push" of prohibition revives in the Blade its old love of reform. It now advises questioning all Republican candidates and voting only for those who promise prohibition. Thereupon, the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette and Cleveland Leader proceed to read the Blade out of the Republican party and delivers it over to "a little crowd of cranks" (i. e. Prohibitionists), who have no business in politics any way." This means dissolution of the Republican party, and that Republieans are "finding the seam" between the saloon and the temperance cause. Now let Prohibitionists "find the seam" between the Masonic and Odd-fellow Prohibitionists, and those in favor of open methods, and the American party will result.

Joseph Cook, in his Boston lecture, February 16, advocates a new party to be called the National Reform party, prohibition, anti-polygamy, pro-Chinese, Indian, etc., etc. We are reluctant to diminish the crowds who hear Mr. Cook, by letting loose on him the myriad-tongued slander of the lodge; but how he is to prohibit liquor without even mentioning the sworn league binding Mason-prohibitionists, and Mason-distillers to stand by each other; or how cure polygamy without taking off the sworn Masonic secrecy which eonceals the plural marriages, does not appear. While U. S. officers cannot penetrate the rccesses of the Endowment House, how are they to prove or prohibit its abominations?

Rev. John G. Fee, of Berea, Kentucky, has issued in the Berea Evangelist, a request for a call for a National Anti-Sect Convention. The undoubted excellence of this brother, and the magnificent record he has made, predispose the Cynosure to endorse every movement he makes: and there are signs all around the horizon, that there will yet be a discussion of sectarianism and its bearings on the cause of Christ. "I am of Paul, and I of Apollos, and Cephas," means seetarianism, and the withering condemnation of it by the apostle, must be heeded and obeyed before the church recovers her purity and spiritual power. But before we can go heartily for a great anti-sect convention, we must know not only what we condemn, but what we approvc. Congregationalists started against sects, but became one. Disciples, sometimes called Campbellites, also. Luther Myrick, made a powerful effort against sect among Presbyterians, and others, too numerous to mention, havc done the same.

What are we to do? Are we to propose a dissolution of all denominations, and leave Christians a dissolved mass, standing in the highway of life? Who will own the meeting-houses, and church property? If we draw all anti-scctarians out of all existing churches, and cx-communicate the rest, then we are in the old weather-bcaten error, "a sect whose creed is that there shall be no sects."

There has bcen some talk of a convention at Wheaton, Ill, in the interest of reform against the lodge, liquor, etc., and if one is held there or elsewhere, we shall vote for Mr. Fee to come and speak against sect.

OUR ANNUAL MEETING.

What shall it be?

Any movement for reform that does not advance, goes baek. Since the middle of the sixteenth century, the Protestant reformation from popery has not advanced one step in Europe. Worse still, there are one or two principalities which have gone back to popery which were once Protestant.

Merc routine business, to hear our treasurer's report, and vote the salaries necessary to keep up the our work, is not sufficient to draw out a crowd, or push our cause with vigor into new fields. Our work is two-fold, to divorce the lodge from the churches, and drive it from legislaturcs, courts and juries. To achieve these two ends, we must adopt feasible, practical measures. For instance, we need:

1. To secure accurate statistics of the secret lodge system in the United States, and so far as possible in the old world.

2. Accurate statements of the relation of the secret lodges to each other and to American principles.

3. To open correspondence with leading prohibition organizations to learn how far they are willing to forego secret temperance methods, and to place the cause on Christ's open platform.

4. To inaugurate political action on the basis of the American platform.

We solicit suggestions and discussion on the above and any cognate topics for our next annual meeting.

GENERAL J. W. PHELPS.

Four hundred men and women under Gen. Phelps as marshal, walked from the Opera Hall, Batavia, N. Y., to the Morgan monument, September 12th, 1882, most of whom continue to this day, but some are fallen asleep. We commend to these for careful perusal, the tribute to Gen. Phelps by his subaltern and companion in arms, Gen. Hawkins: and not to these only, but to every reader of the Cynosure. There ought to be, and doubtless will be, a volume of memoirs of this wonderful man given to the American public. He entered as cadet at West Point in 1832, at nineteen years of age, and spent twenty-three years of his life in active military service. This was one long agony. He was, like his father before him, an intense Whig, and a natural born Abolitionist; and he served Democratic administrations from Jackson to Buchanan, during which period his abhorrenee of the Democratic misrule and subserviency to slavery grew more intense. This prevented his promotion. His scholarship, soldiership, and general superiority were conceded, but Democrats were put above him in violation of the rules of promotion, and he became intensely indifferent to the opinions of others and relied solely on his own: and when, under Albert Sidney Johnston, who afterwards fell at Shiloh, he went to Utah in 1857, as chief of artillery, he became so outraged with the incipient secession which surrounded him that he threw up his commission and went home. Three years after, he left Vermont as Colonel of her first regiment of volunteers for union against secession. We shall give our readers an outline of his career.

[From the New York Times February 4.]

To the Editor of the New York Times:

Gen. John W. Phelps, of Vermont, whose death was announced in your issue of this morning, was one of the most notable officers of the army. He was an accomplished soldier of the highest and best type, a patriotic citizen with an unblemished reputation, a scholar well versed in mathematics, science, history, theology, several of the dead and four or five of the living languages. As a soldier he was all that the best authorities demand, and even more, for it might be said of him that he possessed an inner sense of duty which no written formula could prescribe.

It was his faithful care, intelligence, and attention to his whole duty as a commanding officer, and above all his indefatigable industry, which made his command one of the best disciplined, best drilled and most efficient in the whole army. He was not much of a believer in the extra-unofficial-off-duty dress parade business which to many officers who were mere poseurs seemed to be of so very much importance. Neither was he a martinet. He had the rare good sense to accept the volunteer army for exactly what it was. He weighed its defects and measured its virtues, and governed the performance of his duties accordingly. He knew he could trust its patriotic sense of duty and intelligence to imitate a good example, and its willingness to follow where it could not be driven; and there never was a commanding officer more implicitly obeyed or more confidingly trusted. It was my good fortune to have been ordered to his command at Newport News, Va,, soon after the breaking out of the rebellion in 1861. When I reported to him with my regiment, I was given to understand that we were engaged in a most serious undertaking, involving as it did the national life, and that we could only hope to overcome our foes by taking advantage of all our resources (he was the first to urge the organization of negro troops) and moulding our raw material into a well-disciplined army; that the accomplishment of the latter was the immediate work in hand; and work he made of it, such as many of us never dreamed of before; but we saw the necessity for labor and the good sense involved in his orders and criticisms, and all worked with a will, officers and men, to reward the great industry of a commander who had won our affection, admiration and deep respect.

We went to him as children go to school, and left him after three months' tuition a thoroughly well disciplined regiment, of whose after record he was justly proud. To that kind-hearted, quaint, honest old man, with his perfect sense of justice, the officers and men of my regiment owe a debt of gratitude; which can only be effaced from their memories when the last survivor of that command shall have passed away. This little statement, inadequate as it is, is the tribute I bring to the grave of an honored friend of a quarter of a century. I could not do less; I wish I could do more. Take him for all in all, I have never known a man so free from the hypocricies, sins and vices which make humanity despicable, as was John W. Phelps. Rush C. Hawkins.

New York, Feb. 3, 1885.

THE WHEATON IMBROGLIO.

"Imbroglio. A complicated and embarrassing state of things."—Webster.

"It is of the utmost importance that the Wheaton church maintain her position on the question of secrecy."—John Dorcas.

Our good brother Dorcas overestimates the importance of one particular church. John the Baptist, standing by the rocky bank of Jordan, said to those who fancied the salvation of the world hung on the Jews: "God is able, of these stones, to raise up children unto Abraham." Matt. 3: 9. So he can get along very well without Wheaton College church, Yet the apostacy of the Wheaton church would be an incalculable evil.

But what is "The Wheaton Imbroglio?"

Answer. Wesleyans founded Wheaton College, excluding lodge-worships, as Moses, Elijah, and Jesus Christ excluded Gentile or demon-worships in their day. But neither the friends nor the enemies of Wheaton knew then, nor do they yet know, the nature and vastness of the work which they builded. The execution of three thousand Israelites, by Moses, at Sinai, for attempting, with Aaron's sanction, to mix Satan's worship with God's; the slaying of eight hundred and fifty rich lodge-worshipers, by Elijah; the terrible denunciations of such man-made and devil-inhabited worships, by Christ, (Matt. 7 :9) and Paul, with the howl of the Ephesian shrine-makers, (Acts 19) thereabout,—these and the whole course of Scripture attest the fundamental character of the Wheaton testimony, and explain the imbroglio which followed it.

The sum of the Wheaton testimony condensed was presented to the Illinois State Congregational Association, at Peoria, now above twenty years ago, in the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Jesus Christ is in whatever of religion he has appointed, whether Doctrine, Government, or Rites; and Satan, the god of this world, enhabits all the rest."

This single proposition, understood and practiced, would wipe out all false religions and man-parts of true religion on earth: the Papacy, Mormonism, Masonry, etc., etc., included.

The proposer of the resolution was assailed and derided, anonymously, in the Peoria Transcript; and the resolution was declared "a disgrace" by members of the Association. Wheaton College was prosecuted by the Whcaton lodge-master, in the circuit and supreme courts of Illinois. The courts sustained the College. Two College professors urged the College President to accept a subscription of $1,000 from the same lodge-master, and to wave the Wesleyan rule excluding the secret lodgc-worships. This being refused, they attempted openly to remove the College President, but failed; and only removed themselves.

The imbroglio spread beyond Wheaton. The President applied to the Andover Faculty, and all but one, who was absent, signed a request to the Boston Tract Society, for a tract warning Congregational church members against secret societies. Professor Park signed the petition, and Professor Phelps warmly thanked the Wheaton President for drawing up the paper. The tract was printed, but suppressed!

About that time, application was made to theCollege Society meeting at Norwich, Conn., for aid to Wheaton College. The application was defeated by four letters from Illinois which were read to the College Society. The writers of those letters still hate the College. A Mason had joined the Wheaton church without leaving the lodge, and others had joined who hated our testimony against lodgery. These, with one of the professors, formed a new party; in the words of their ex-parte council, "To effect a change in the presidency of the College." This party was led by the Senior Warden of the Wheaton Masonic lodge. This attempt failed. Again it was the Professor, not the President, who was removed; and thirty members or so, withdrew from the College church; carried away the church records, and claimed the name; which, however, they soon dropped from their manual, along with the testimonies against the lodge and liquor. Eight members of this withdrawing party, in a private house, voted to drop one hundred or more members of the College church, and to excommunicate the College President! On the strength of this excommunication, Elgin Congregational Association withdrew its privileges from the latter; and the clerk of the State Association omitted his name in calling the roll, without a question asked or a word spoken before that body on the subject! Rev. A. A. Stevens, of Peoria, then moved a committee of inquiry, and the motion for information was suppressed.

Seven years have passed away, and no war has been waged; but the outrage has been born in silence, and the cause of Christ has suffered. But, lately, Prof. Willcox, Dr. Bascom, Evangelist Bell, and others, have urged that steps be taken to remove the evil. By such suggestions, approved by Dr. Goodwin of the First Congregational church, and Dr. Little of the New England church, Chicago, "A committee of conference and conciliation" was appointed, and has made three attempts to meet; but has failed for a variety of reasons. It finally adjourned to meet at the call of Pres. C. A. Blanchard who has hopes of adjustment and reconciliation.

This brief sketch of the Wheaton imbroglio is given for the benefit of Mr. Dorcas, and some thousands of our readers, who are concerned lest Wheaton should apostatize.

Feb. 4, 1885.—The committee of conference met to-day in Farwell Hall building, present Profs. Fisk and Willcox, of the Chicago Theological Seminary, Drs. Noble, Goodwin, Williams, and Little; Rev. Robt. West, of the Advance, with deacons S. B. French, C. F. Gates, and Mr. Ensign. On the part of the College church, Pres. C. A. Blanchard. Dr. A. H. Hiatt, and Mr. W. B. Guild.

A paper was presented for discussion and adoption to the following effect: "We, a committee to consider the status and advise concerning the duties of the Wheaton College church find that the alleged excommunication of Pres. J. Blanchard was not pursuant to any advice of council, or trial by any church; and,

Whereas,—The sentiments of Wheaton College church are evangelical, and its polity Congregational, we advise them to apply to be received by the Elgin Association."

Objection being made by a portion of the committee, the paper was dropped. Pres. C. A. Blanchard then asked the committee to advise a mutual council. This was moved and seconded, but lost by a divided vote. The committee then voted in substance, that they had no definite advice to give; as seen in their courteous and friendly action which here follows:

"A conference of Christian brethren was held by invitation of the College church of Wheaton, Ill., in the parlors of the Y. M. C. A., Chicago, pursuant to adjournment, on Wednesday, March 4th, at 2 P. M. Present, Rev. Drs. E. P. Goodwin, F. A. Noble, Arthur Little, E. F. Williams; Rev. Profs. F. W. Fisk, G. B. Willcox, Rev. Robert West, brethren C. F. Gates, F. G. Ensign, S. B. French.

"Prof. Fisk was chosen moderator and Prof. Willcox scribe.

"After full consultation with the aid of Rev. Pres. C. A. Blanchard, Dr. A. H. Hiatt and Mr. W. B. Guild, it was,—

"Resolved, That this Committee of Conference and Conciliation, called by the College church at Wheaton, suggest that, in the present state of things, it is expedient for that church to do nothing but "strive for the things that make for peace" and quietly pursue the work in which they have for the past eight years been engaged.

"Adjourned without day.

Attest. G. B. WILLCOX, Scribe."

Of course, matters will not rest here. Seven years ago when these troubles began the College church asked Elgin Association to inquire thoroughly into their troubles. It was declined. Rev. Wm. Stevens of Peoria, moved in our State association the same thing, but the motion was defeated. This recent attempt to procure investigation was made at the instance of Prof. Willcox, of the Seminary, who suggested a council a year ago, and also of Dr. Bascom and others, by whose well-meant suggestions a conference committee was appointed, with the result above given.

During the struggle with slavery, a multitude of ministers declared themselves to be opposed to it, and felt themselves slandered if called "pro-slavery," who never voted, prayed or preached against it in public, or even attended anti-slavery conventions. Miss Flagg's seriel thus graphically describes the case of these respected brethren:—She says:

"We bespeak the reader's charity for ministers whom one or two Masons or Odd-fellows in their congregations effectually intimidate. * * The whole lodge power stands behind them; that subtle, mysterious, Satanic force of which Revelation is full of dim hints. It backs up every popular iniquity. It cannot be grasped or measured, or analyzed; yet it sways politicians, controls Legislatures, gags the pulpit, persecutes the saints; and to resist which requires more courage, or more faith in God, than most men possess."

Yet these very men who stand silent or quail before the lodge, often do more things in the course of a year from no motive but the love of Christ than many Anti-masons. Let us, therefore, be charitable, while we are firm.

A QUESTION ANSWERED.

NEWARK, Ill.

There are some members of the church in this place who refuse to take the elements of the Lord's Supper from the hands of a minister who is a Mason or member of any secret religious (so-called) organization which does not acknowledge the Lord Jesus Christ as the only Saviour. Is their action in this case right and in accordance with the teachings of the Bible, or not?

Will the editor or some one else answer the above, and oblige? J. S. BIBBINS.

We have to say to this good and beloved brother: "Let every man be thoroughly persuaded in his own mind." It is sin to eat stolen meal, knowing it to be stolen; but if shut up in a den of robbers, and it was eat or starve, then eat and break out on the strength of it.

Have no fellowship with Freemasons. That is the rule. But if you are a wife and a brute of a husband will kill you if you do not go to meeting with him; then do the very best you can, and cry steadily to God: and if it comes to martyrdom, die, and die bravely. The flames of the stake have borne many to heaven. But be sure you give God the benefit of your sense as well as your conscience.

—A few additional names to the Washington monument protest run up the whole number to 16,063.

—The Nemaha County Republican, Sabetha, Kan., prints a point-blank anti-lodge article from Geo. T. Dissette, the newly appointed Illinois lecturer.

—Bro. H. H. Hinman, was at Plainfield, Ind., Saturday, making appointments to be filled hereafter. He contemplates a trip to Berea, Kentucky.

—Bro. S. E. Starry returned home to Iowa last week, calling briefly at the Cynosure office. He has spoken twenty-two times in New York State. He is called home by the sickness of Mrs. Starry.

—Feb. 7th was Masonic day at the New Orleans exposition, says a small Masonic sheet. As there has been no general mention of the affair by the press it must have been a short day, or a rainy day, or the display of lodgery was so insignificant, or disgusting to the public that it has fallen among the days worthy only to be forgotten.

REFORM NEWS.

REFORM WORK IN ILLINOIS.

The Illinois State association has been several times disappointed after it had supposed an agent was secured. It now believes success to have crowned its efforts. However, considerable work has been done in this State during the past year by Pres. J. Blanchard, Pres. C. A. Blanchard, Secretary Stoddard, Messrs. J. F. Brown, H. H. Hinman, S. E. Starry, and W. B. Lloyd.

Mr. Lloyd lectured eight times in DeKalb county; three times in school-houses and five times in churches, Free Methodists, Wesleyan Methodists, and Methodist Episcopal churches opening their doors to the discussion. He walked many miles against some of the severest cold winds of the season in his efforts to advance the interests of the reform. Unforseen personal matters compelled his attention at home. If he could have continued through the year, it would have resulted in great good to the cause.

Rev. H. H. Hinman, besides much visiting and correspondence, lectured eleven times in December, nineteen times in January, and four times in February, through the counties of Will, McLean, La Salle, Marshall, Putnam, Bureau, Henry, Stark, Hancock, Adams and Cook. Ten of these were in United Brethren, nine in Swedish Lutheran, four in Christian, two in A. M. E., one in Free Methodist, one in Wesleyan Methodist, one in Methodist Episcopal, one in Baptist and and three in public halls. His report states that he had the sympathy, not only of the members in whose churches he lectured, but members of other denominations gave him Christian fellowship and material aid. This shows that there is no abatement of interest in the anti-secrecy reform.

Rev. George T. Dissette of Sabetha, Kansas, has just entered upon the work as the Illinois State lecturer, and (D. V.) will continue his work for one year. His route for the present is through St. Clair, Clinton, Marion, Clay, Richland and Lawrence counties. Then he expects to turn north and visit through the two eastern tiers of counties. His services are free to all, as he is supported by voluntary contributions.

In coming to this State Mr. Dissette rejoices in the providence of God, which permits him to testify to the truth which he once opposed, for it was here that he became not only an M. E. minister, but also a Freemason and an Odd-fellow.

If you desire his services or wish to contribute to his support, you may address the undersigned who acts in behalf of the executive committee.

THE FRIENDS OF THE INDIANA BORDER.

CHRISMAN, Ill., Mar. 5, 1885.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Leaving Chicago Feburary 26, I reached Newport, Ind., at 4:30 P. M., to find that my letter sent in advance, had not arrived, and the friend who was to meet me was nearly ten miles away. The next morning, however, was bright and beautiful and I walked about half the way and obtained a ride for the remainder. I was most kindly received by W. D. Walthal, a prominent member of the Society of Friends; who, because of their being the earliest settlers, gave name to the place, Quaker Point. When they asked for a post-office, the department for some unknown reason changed the name to Quaker Hill, which is now applied to a little village in a valley.

On Saturday night, by invitation, I addressed the friends of temperance and they organized an association. On Sabbath I attended public worship and Sabbath school in the morning. Using the liberty accorded to all who have a message to declare, I spoke from Isa. 52: 1. In the afternoon I attended a missionary meeting and spoke on Africa and the missionary cause. I was glad to know that there was a deep interest in African missions and that a member of the Society of Friends was in the company of Bishop Taylor en route for Central Africa. In the evening I spoke to a fair congregation on the relation of secret societies to Christianity. I was glad to feel that I had the sympathy of all the older members. A few, however, showed their ignorance and want of self-respect by some rudeness.

On Monday night I spoke in the same place on the relations of secretism to civil government. On Tuesday went some ten miles into Illinois to see a "Friend" who had recently become a member, and was suposed to be an adhering Mason. He received us most kindly, and admitted what we said about the order. He regarded the oaths and penalties as altogether wrong, and the ceremonies as needless and silly. He said he did not propose to ever meet with them again. He accompanied us to Wesley Chapel and after listening to my lecture expressed himself pleased with what had been said. The audience was fair and the attention excellent.

A long ride home through deep snow drifts and mud, often winding through fields, brought us to brother Walthal's, where, after a night's rest we started for Ridge Farm, Ill., to attend Friends meeting. We reached there just in time and enjoyed very much the communion of saints. In the evening I had a small but most interesting audience, who were all eager to secure tracts.

To-day I visited Friends meeting at Vermillion Grove, and have arranged for future lectures, and to-morrow, shall, D. V., go to central Indiana. I have found the Society of Friends with us in their sympathies, but with some exceptions hardly awake to the importance of the subject. H. H. HINMAN.

Never so gloriously, never so lovingly, as when the king, now exalted on the throne of the cross, inclined his head to give the last kiss of affection to His bride; or as others will understand it, to ask her leave to absent Himself for a little while, according to that saying, "I will come again and receive you unto myself."—Wasimund.

One of the most immodest and detestable fashions ever the devil invented is the modern bangs. Indeed, we should not wonder if the Arch-fiend himself is ashamed of his banged subjects. He nearly always gives some reason for everything he originates, but we believe we have never heard any given for the bangs, save that they are fashionable.

The Home.

"WOULD YE BRING THEM BACK AGAIN?"

Gone to the land of life and light,
Those whom we loved—this fatal year!
Risen to mansions fair and bright,
Dwelling in God's eternal sight,
Those whom we held so dear—so dear!

What have they left us? Memories deep,
Memories holy and tender and true,
Yea, were death an endless sleep,
These would not slumber, these would keep
Safe from decay the forms we knew.

Deathless in God's diviner sphere,
Rapt and serene our loved ones dwell,
Complete in the bliss they prayed for here;
Perfect in love, in vision clear,
Who of their sacred joy can tell?

Wisdom and truth and peace are theirs,
Knowledge that deepens each passing hour;
Fruition to faith, and answers to prayers,
No conflict of soul, no weary cares,
In that high life of immortal power.

Shall we demand their return again,
Dear as they were—to the strife once more?
Call them back to the grief and pain,
Back to the toil, the fret, the stain,
Back to the world from that beautiful shore?

No! With the blessed let them be,
Safe and saved in the Saviour's smile,
Bending to him the adoring knee,
Singing to us from the crystal sea,
"Here with us in a little while!"

THE UNSEEN PROVIDENCE.

A few years ago Hannah Whitall Smith, of Philadelphia, wrote to a friend explaining how afflictive and even destructive providences can be reconciled with the goodness of God. Mrs. Willard, of the Union Signal, in whose columns the extract below appears, adds a valuable note:

"There is an answer and it is found in Christ. He reveals the character of God, and in that character lies the solvent for every difficulty. God is love, God is good, God is wise, God is just, God is omnipotent, God is omnipresent. Then all is well. The seen thing is, it is true, all wrong, but the seen thing is not the true thing. It is only a partial view, and a partial view of anything is untrue. One may see a partial view of a river, and declare it to be a lake, because no outlet can be seen. And to look at a parent's dealing with a child for only one hour out of the twenty-four, especially if that is the hour for teaching a lesson, or the hour for administering medicine, would give a most untrue idea of a parent's love. Imagine, for instance, that a being from another planet, where love is unknown, should come to this planet, and begin to investigate the ways and manners here, and should be told about mothers and their love for their children, and, becoming very much interested in it, should ask to see it. And imagine that being taken into a nursery just at the moment when the mother is having her darling child vaccinated. All that would be seen would be the crying, squirming baby, the doctor's knife, the baby's blood, and the mother's firm, unflinching hand holding her child steady under the butchering knife. Should that being from another world judge by the seen thing, how false would be his judgment! Now, this world's life is only one hour out of God's twenty-four, and it is the vaccinating hour. The seen thing is hard and cruel, and it looks as though God did not care. But there is a before and an after, and we should be fools to judge from just this one hour.

"We must answer all our perplexities and our anguish by the fact of God, for there is no other answer. Since God is God, then all must be well, no matter how it looks. And you must take your stand here with an unalterable determination to stand there until you die, or you are in danger of a grievous shipwreck of faith. The world is a place of sorrow and anguish, of cyclones and pestilences, and awful bereavements; and human love makes room for so much human misery that sometimes it seems better not to love at all. There does seem to be partial dealing, and some have all the sunshine and others all the shade, and all the lives of earnest souls seem to be required to remedy the mistakes made by the Creator of us all. It is nothing but misery and mystery on any side, and back of all, and above all, and beneath all, and around all, is God; and he is the satisfying answer. He himself, what he is in character, and not his ways or his plans. These last we may misunderstand, but goodness of character we cannot mistake, and it is God's character that is our resting place. Therefore, we may be sure we have no private mercies, for that would be injustice, and God's character is just. If we have not been called to pass through some sorrows that others have languished, it can only be because our Father saw they did not contain the medicine our souls needed. He is no kinder to us than to them. Like thee, I, too, want only what humanity has, but that is everything—a Father's love, a Father's care, a mother's tender brooding. And when this hour is passed with all its mysterious sorrow, the rest of God's day lies before us, and everlasting gladness shall be upon your heads.

"And all this is revealed to us in Christ. He tells us what he is, that God is, for only in him is the Father revealed. What he said and did is just what God would have said and done under like circumstances. He was nothing more nor less than God revealed."

And yet another thought comes to us. Though God is good, man is sinful—and the world is all astray through sin. Who shall say what sin does in the whole creation, which St. Paul says "groaneth and travaileth until now," by way of interference with God's plan in nature. God's will was expressed to man in the Garden of Eden—Paradise is the normal residence of the beloved being God made and called good. Cyclones, hurricanes, disease and pestilence are not the phenomena of Paradise. Is it wrong to say that they belong to the vast territory cursed for man's sake, and made, by one act of disobedience and a flaming sword, the inheritance of us all?

Nevertheless, above them all, overruling even the consequences of sin, sits our Heavenly Father making all things, even these, the results of disobedience, work together for good—for our good if we love him and have come into such relations to him that he can reach us with blessing. Truly since God is God, we need not fear. Even the unseen Providence is full of mercy and of love. The unfathomed will of God is a mine of infinite riches and unending treasure. Let us invest our all in its depths in perfect faith and trust.

DEATH OF THE FIRST BORN.

This beautiful extract, from Dr. Holland's "Arthur Bonnicastle," will be read with deep and tender interest by many whose experience it truthfully portrays:

"I stand in a darkened room before a casket that holds the silent form of my first born. My arm is around the wife and mother, who weeps over the lost treasure and cannot, till tears have their way, be comforted. I had not thought that my child could die—that my child could die. I knew that other children had died, but I felt safe. We lay the little one close by his grandfather at last; we strew his grave with flowers, and then return to our saddened home with hearts united in sorrow as they had never been united in joy, and with sympathies forever opened toward all who are called to a kindred grief. I wonder where he is to-day, in what mature angelhood he stands, how he will look when I meet him, how he will make himself known to me, who has been his teacher! He was like me. Will his grandfather know him? I never can cease thinking of him as cared for and led by the hand to which my own youthful fingers clung, and as hearing from the fond lips of my own father the story of his father's eventful life. I feel how wonderful has been the ministry of my children—how much more I have learned from them than they have ever learned from me—how by holding my own strong life in sweet subordination of their helplessness, they have taught me patience, self-sacrifice, self-control, truthfulness, faith, simplicity, and purity.

"Ah! this taking to one's arms a little group of souls, fresh from the hand of God, and living with them in loving companionship through all their stainless years, is, or ought to be, like living in heaven, for of such is the heavenly kingdom. To no one of these am I more indebted than to the boy who went away from me before the world had touched him with a stain. The key that shut him in the tomb was the only key that could unlock my heart, and let in among its sympathies the world of sorrowing men and women who mourn because their little ones are not.

"The little graves, alas! how many they are! The mourners above them, how vast the multitude! Brothers, sisters, I am one with you. I press your hands, I weep with you, I trust with you, I belong to you. Those waxen, folded hands, that still heart, so often pressed warm to our own, those sleep bound eyes which have been so full of love and life, that sweet, unmoving alabaster, ah! We have all looked upon them, and they made us one, and made us better. There is no fountain which the healing angel troubles with his restless and life-giving wings so constantly as the fountain of tears, and only those too lame and bruised to bathe, miss the blessed influence."

A CUP OF COLD WATER.

"Four days before I went to the front with my regiment," says Congressman Blackburn, of Kentucky, "we had a little girl baby. She is now grown, and you alway see her with me at any social gathering. In our army, the furloughs came very rarely. When we got into line there was no chance for a man to get home. It was about three years afterward that a few of us were going down the Mississippi on a river steamer. I had been sick and was returning to my command, but pretty well broken up even then. As for money, we did not have any, and the night was hot; as I laid down on the deck, my throat almost parched with thirst. Pretty soon a little girl came along with a big glass of lemonade. I tell you it looked good to me. She saw me eying it, stopped a minute, looked doubtfully at me, and finally came up to my side. 'You looked as if you wanted something to drink,' she said, and offered me the glass. It wasn't quite the square thing to do, but I took it and handed it back to her empty. It was like nectar to me. Then I thanked the little creature, and sent her away. Soon after, just like any other child, she came back, leading her mother to see the poor soldier. It was my wife, and the girl was the baby whom I had last seen as a baby but just born. You can imagine the re-union. They were with my brother's family, and happened to be going down the river."

HAPPY HOMES.

Home ought to be the most pleasant and comfortable spot on earth. Better be provoking anywhere else than at home. One should never plant thorns where he has to spend much of his time himself. A little self-denial, a habit of pleasant speaking, a consideration of the wants of others—these make home delightful. The Rev. F. E. Clark, in a sermon printed in the Golden Rule, thus touches upon a habit that makes many a home insufferable: "Oh, the eternal nagging and fault finding and carping that go on in many a family! Every little personal, every little harmless pet idulgence, every ingrained trait on either side, comes in for a pestering fire of unpleasant remarks, that prick and scarify and sting until that house is no more fit to live in than a patch of nettles is for a tired man's bed."

Great sorrow is often needed to develop a good Christian. When the oil wells in Pennsylvania dry up, the owners sink great torpedoes of nitroglycerine down into them a thousand or fifteen hundred feet to the bottom, and there explode them, rending and crushing the rock on every side, frequently opening pent up fountains of oil, which change the worthless hole into a richly producing well again. So the Christian sometimes seems to dry up. Though a fountain of truth may be hidden in his heart, it is of no value until it is broken open by some sharp providence; until God lets down into that heart some great sorrow, crushing it and setting free the richness of his truth and goodness.

THE LITTLE GRAVE.

"Tis only a little grave they said,
"Only just a child that's dead."
And so they carelessly turned away
From the mound the spade had made that day.
Ah! they did not know how deep a shade
That little grave on our home had made.

I know the coffin was narrow and small,
One yard would have served for an ample pall
And one man in his arms could have borne away
The rosewood and its freight of clay.
But I know that darling hopes were hid
Beneath that little coffin lid.

I know that a mother stood that day
With folded arms by that form of clay;
I know that burning tears were hid;
"'Neath the drooping lash and aching lid;"
And I know her lip, and cheek and brow,
Were almost as her baby's now.

I know some things were hid away,
The crimson frock and wrappings gay;
The little sack and half worn shoe,
The cap with its plumes and tassels blue,
And the empty crib with its covers spread,
As white as the face of the sinless dead.

'Tis a little grave: but oh! have care!
For world-wide hopes are buried there;
And ye, perhaps, in coming years,
May see, like her, through blinding tears,
How much of light, how much of joy,
Is buried with an only boy.

A LONG, LONG JOURNEY.

When the doctor came down stairs from the sick room of Mrs. Marshall the whole family seemed to have arranged themselves in the hall to whylay him.

"How soon will mamma dit well?" asked little Clyde, the baby.

"Can mamma come down stair next week?" asked Katy, the eldest daughter and the little housekeeper.

"Do you find my wife much better?" asked Mr. Marshall, eagerly. He was a tall, grave man, pale with anxiety and nights of watching.

The docter did not smile; he did not even stop to answer their questions.

"I am in a great hurry," he said, as he took his hat; "I must go to a person who is dangerously ill. This evening I will call again. I have left instructions with the nurse."

But the nurses' instructions were all concerning the comfort of the patient; she was professionally discreet and silent. The children playing on the stairs were told to make no noise. The gloomy day wore on, and the patient slept and was not disturbed. But that night, before they went to bed, they were allowed to go in and kiss their mother good-night. This privilege had been denied them lately, and their hearts responded with joy to the invitation. Mamma was better or she could not see them. The doctor had cured her. They would love him for it all their lives! She was very pale, but smiling, and her first words to them were:

'I am going on a journey!"

"A journey," cried the children. "Will you take us with you?"

"No; it is a long, long journey."

"Mamma is going to the South," said Katy; "the doctor has ordered her to. She will get well in the orange groves of Florida."

"I am going to a far distant country, more beautiful than even the lovely South," said the mother, faintly, "and I will not come back."

"You are going alone, Mamma?" asked Katy.

"No," said the mother in a low sweet voice. "I am not going alone. My Physician goes with me. Kiss me good-by, my dear ones, for in the morning before you are awake I shall be gone. You will all come to me when you are made ready, but each must make the journey alone."

In the morning she was gone. When the children awoke their father told them of the beautiful country at which she had safely arrived while she slept.

"How did she go? Who came for her?" they asked amid their tears.

"The chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof!" their father told them solemnly.

People wonder at the peace and happiness expressed in the faces of those motherless children; when asked about their mother they say: "She has gone on a journey," and every night and morning they read in their guide-book of that land where she now lives, whose inhabitants shall no more say, "I am sick, and where God shall wipe all tears from their eyes."—Detroit Free Press.

WONDERFUL TOWERS.

The ancient city of Pisa, Italy, is famous for its lofty and magnificent structures, some of which have very interesting histories. None of them, however, is so wonderful as the celebrated leaning tower. This building was commenced in 1174 by a Pisan architect, named Bonana, by William of Innspruck. It is of cylindrical form, 179 feet high, 50 feet in diameter, and leans 12 feet 9 inches from the perpendicular. It consists of eight stories, each of which has an outside gallery projecting from it. From the summit, which is reached by several hundred steps, a beautiful and extensive view may be had of the surrounding country.

The miseonstruction was discovered before the tower was finished, and the upper tiers were so shaped as to partly counteract the arcutation. At the top of the tower seven immense bells were so placed as, by their weight, to counterbalance the leaning of the tower.

The highest tower in the old world is at Cremona, northern Italy; it is 396 feet high. It was begun in 1283, and the bells which are in it were cast in 1578. An astronomical clock, made in the year 1594, is placed in the third story.

The Florentine campanile was commenced in 1334, by Giotto, the great painter, architect and sculptor. He commenced the erection of the tower with the determination to surpass all the ancient structures of this kind, both in height and in richness of design. But Giotto having died in 1336, the tower was completed by Taddeo Gaddi. Its height is 276 feet, and it is divided into four tiers. It is of equal dimensions from bottom to top, and is built in the Italian Gothic style. On the basement floor there are two rows of tablets in relief; they are the work of Giotto. There are also many beautiful statutes on the upper tier. It was the original design of Giotto to have a spire surmount the present tower. And the columns which were to support it may still be seen on the top of the building.

The famous tower known as Giralda is situated at Seville, Spain. This tower, when originally built by Philip Guevara, the Moor, was only 250 feet high. But in 1568 a magnificent belfry 100 feet high was added, and it is now the second highest in the world. This campanile was called Giralda because of the brazen weathercock in its top-story. Although the figure weighs over a ton and a half it is easily turned by the wind.

It is said that a very fine campanile was situated at Salisbury, England. It is supposed to have been 200 feet high, and was probably destroyed by Sir Thomas Wyatt, the younger, while leading an insurrectionary mob.

DOING AND BEING.

A young girl had been trying to do something very good, and had not succeeded very well. Her friend, hearing her complain, said:

"God gives us many things to do, but don't you think he gives us something to be as well?"

"O, dear! tell me about being," said Marion looking up. "I will think about being if you will help me."

Her friend answered, "God says:

"'Be kindly affectionate one to another.'

"'Be ye also patient.'

"'Be ye thankful.'

"'Be not conformed to this world.'

"'Be ye therefore perfect.'

"'Be courteous.'

"'Be not wise in your own conceit.'

"'Be not overcome of evil.'"

Marion listened, but made no reply.

Twilight grew into darkness. The tea-bell sounded, bringing Marion to her feet. In the firelight Elizabeth could see that she was very serious.

"I'll have a better day to-morrow. I see that doing grows out of being."

"We cannot be what God loves without doing what he commands. It is easier to do with a rush than to be patient, or unselfish, or humble, or just, or watchful."

"I think it is," returned Marion.—Watchman.

Finish What You Begin.—My old great-grand mother Knox had a way of making her children finish their work. If they began a thing they must complete it. If they undertook to build a cob-house they must not leave it until it was done, and nothing of work or play to which they set their hands would she allow them to abandon incomplete. I sometimes wish I had been trained in this way. How much of life is wasted in unfinished work! Many a man uses up his time in splendid beginnings. The labor devoted to commence ten things and leave them useless, would finish five of them, and make them profitable and useful. Finish you work. Life is brief; time is short. Stop beginning forty things, and go back and finish four. Put patient, persistent toil into the matter, and, be assured, one completed undertaking will yield more pleasure, and the world more profit, than a dozen fair plans of which people say "This man began to build, and was not able to finish." "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might."

There is a man in Sixth avenue, New York, whose dog has gone for his morning paper every morning for years. The man always gave the dog a 3-cent piece to buy the paper. When the price came down to 2 cents, the dog threatened to tear the newsdealer to pieces until he passed over the penny change.

A dozen cows and a lame horse feeding in a pasture near Gloucester, Mass., were attacked by a New Foundland dog. The lameness of the horse left him at the mercy of the dog. The cows huddled together and seemed to consult. They then advanced in a body and covered the retreat of the horse, keeping their heads lowered and their horns presented to the dog until it gave up the pursuit.

TEMPERANCE.

MICHIGAN PROHIBITION CONVENTION.

A State convention of Prohibitionists met at Lansing, Mich., on the 25th ult. The press reports speak thus of the appearace of our old friend George W. Clark, the reform singer:

George W. Clark of Detroit, a veteran of more than fifty-seven years in temperance work, took the floor, and made a brief but vigorous speech, partly historical and partly on matters pertaining to the present issue. He was the editor of the first temperance paper in Michigan. It did his heart good to look back to the earliest days of the "movement" and see the progress made since then. He hoped the work in Michigan would speedily become as successful as it was in Maine, his native State. The tobacco habit he exposed and denounced as a twin vice and leading to and associated with the liquor vice, and he hoped some steps would be taken to crush it out too. Mr. Clark finally treated the convention to a temperance song, which he rendered in a remarkably clear and strong voice for so aged a man.

There were in the convention 229 delegates. Besides these perhaps as many more visitors were in attendance—including some members of the legislature—giving an audience of between 400 and 500. The large number of delegates, under the circumstances, was a surprise to many, and a new and overwhelming evidence of the strength of the party.

The evening session was addressed by Prof. Dickey, Mrs. Lathrop, Rev. John Russel, Chas. Mosher, W. F. Clark and Geo. W. Clark who closed with a grand prophetic song for victory.

It has been decided by those with whom the idea of a "centennial temperance celebration" some time during this year originated, that it shall take place in September, beginning Sunday, the 20th, with temperance sermons and lectures by ministers of all creeds and denominations and by temperance evangelists and lecturers throughout the entire country. Monday, 21st, public demonstrations are recommended to be universally held, and the entire week to be known as "Centennial Week." The National Temperance Society was invited to call a Centennial Temperance Conference of three days during the week, at which carefully prepared papers on the various phases of the question are to be read and discussed.

—The celebrated Dr. B. W. Richardson, in a recent lecture, denied that excessive eating was as injurious and dangerous as excessive drinking. In the course of thirty-four years' professional experience he had only known one case in which a patient died from intemperate eating, and this was coupled with immoderate drinking; but on the other hand, he had known 300 persons who died from excessive drinking, all of whom passed to death through the door of moderation. When any one arrived at the conclusion that alcohol was a necessity, he was in the first stage of alcoholic disease. The sense of the necessity was the first symtom of the disease; the declaration of the necessity was the declaration of the disease. Alcohol was in no sense food, nor was it true that those who did not drink were obliged to consume more food. He was himself a living proof of the falsehood of this contention.

—A vigorous movement is in progress for the emancipation of the city of Atlanta, Georgia, from the thrall of the liquor interest. Several years ago the whisky-men of the city combined for the purpose of influencing local legislation. They soon grew so powerful that without the approval of the Liquor Dealers' Association it was impossible to reach any place in the city government. Several attempts at reform have resulted in the triumph of the liquor faction, but another and more determined attempt will soon be made. At a meeting of citizens recently held irrespective of politics, it was decided to nominate a full ticket of municipal officers pledged to moral reform and opposition to the whisky element. If this movement is successful, as now appears probable, the next effort will be to apply local option to Atlanta, as it now exists in eighty-five counties of the State. The cause of temperance is evidently "marching through Georgie."

The Churches.

—Forty persons were received into the Congregational church, Peoria, February 1st, of whom thirty-three came on confession. Meetings have been held nearly every evening under the direction of the pastor, Rev. E. F. Howe, and over forty have expressed the purpose to enter the Christian life. The interest is increasing.

—Rev. Geo. W. Milton, late of Winnebago, Ill., has lately accepted a call to Hastings, Nebraska.

—Rev. Albert Ethridge, formerly of Marseilles, Ill., and later residing in Des Moines, Iowa, has accepted the pastorate of the Independent church in Streator, Ill.

—Basil Stephanoff, the young Macedonian student at Evanston, Ill., has been assisting in revival work for five weeks, in Freeport. Among the conversions were two prisoners in the county jail.

—There has been a remarkable revival of religion in Greenwich, Ohio. There have been over 200 conversions. The Methodists, Congregationalists and Friends united in holding meetings.

—Bishop Fabre, of Montreal, has issued a circular to the clergy of his diocese calling attention to the dangers which menace their flocks from attending immoral plays and from holding private theatricals.

—Professor L. T. Townsend, in a series of papers in Zion's Herald on faith cures and prayer for healing, takes strong ground against abandoning the use of physicians and remedies, but hints that in future ages diseases may be largely disarmed.

—The religious interest in Richmond, Va., which began during the convention conducted by Mr. Moody, continues without abatement. During the week ending on February 14th, daily services were held in many of the churches—Baptist, Methodist and Presbyterian. Many persons confess conversion, and a large number have been or will be received into church fellowship. Rev. Dr. Hoge has been preaching every Sabbath evening to a large audience at the Old Market. These services attract many not accustomed to attendance at church. One indication of the general interest is found in the sale of Mr. Moody's sermons on the trains of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad. The newsboys say that nothing sells more rapidly.

—It will doubtless be interesting to many of our readers to know of Mr. Moody's engagements for the present month: Louisville, Ky., March 1st, 2d, and 3rd; Springfield, Ill., 4th and 5th; Peoria, 6th, 7th and 8th; Davenport, Iowa, 10th, 11th and 12th; Des Moines, Iowa, 13th, 14th and 15th; Omaha, Neb., 17th, 18th and 19th; Kansas City, Mo., 20th, 21st and 22d; Emporia, Kansas, 24th and 25th. Efforts are being put forth to have Mr. Moody come to Chicago and hold services, on his way home from Kansas.

—Statistics collected for reports at Yale Theological Seminary on the day of Prayer for Colleges show that there are represented in that institution forty-five different colleges, together with several who have entered upon examination without a degree from any college. At the latest report there were seventeen different denominations represented among the students. On the Day of Prayer for Colleges, reports are heard from the various Colleges represented, upon all matters of religious interest connected with them. Rev. Edward Coe, of New York, addressed the University in the afternoon, and the several classes were addressed by other distinguished ministers.

—The Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church, Dr. T. L. Cuyler, pastor, has a membership of 1,960. The benevolent contributions last year amounted to $17,780 The Sunday-school numbers 1,350.

—Thus far out of the 620 places in Palestine west of the Jordan mentioned in the Bible, 420 have been identified, 132 of which identifications were made by the staff of the Palestine Exploration Fund.

—The prospect of the union between the Waldensian Church and the Free Italian Church grows brighter. A committee has been appointed to consider how the union can be advanced, and what must be the terms of union.

—Dr. Muir is a minister of the Free Church in Leith, Scotland. He began life as a Presbyterian minister in Boston, U. S. A. The Leith dignitary was not at all a success in the pastorate, and, in fact, the question was often raised as to whether he had any congregation at all. He has now, however, contrived to achieve a momentary notoriety. For two Sabbaths his empty benches have been crowded by people gathering to hear him prove the Primacy of St. Peter. The congregation was not very reverent. A loud "Hear! hear!" was heard from the pews during the delivery of the sermon, and when the preacher spoke with profound respect of the Holy Father, and did something like crossing himself, there was loud and repeated laughter.—Lutheran Witness.

—The solemn tolling of the great bell of St. Paul's at the recent death of the Bishop of London attracted great attention in the metropolis, and crowds assembled to note the sound which is so seldom heard. The bell is never tolled but at the death or funeral of members of the royal family, of the Bishop of London, of a Lord Mayor dying in office, and of the Dean of St. Paul's. The bell weighs about five tons and has a diameter of nine feet.

—The Protestants of St. Gall, Switzerland, have lately celebrated the 400th anniversary of the birth of the Reformer of their canton, James de Watt. A mural tablet was attached to the house in which he was born, lived and died.

—At Kioto, Japan, a large Buddhist temple is being erected, the timber and pillars of which are put in place by ropes of human hair. The hair, having been offered by worshipers of the god in whose honor the temple is built, is cut off and the priests twist it into church ropes. Devotees have in their ardor cut and hauled a great deal of the timber, giving their labor as a free-will offering.

—The sword by which protestants heritics were executed in Bohemia in the fifteenth century, and the silver communion cup lately exhumed in that country, and which has been in the possession of Scotch Presbyterians, have been sent to Dr. Breed of Philadelphia, for exhibition in this country.

—The Rev. Dr. Cunningham Geikie is going to Egypt and Palestine, and will write a series of 20 letters on the manners and customs of those countries.

—The report of the Baptist Association of Pennsylvania says that while the population of the State is about 4,500,000, only 500,000 of this number are members of evangelical churches. There are eleven counties, with a population of 300,000 without one Baptist Church, and five counties have only a single Baptist Church each. There is on an average about one Baptist to every sixty-six of the entire population of the State.

Lutheran Statistics.—The Lutheran Book Concern, at Columbus, O., has recently compiled complete statistics of the Lutheran church in the United States, which present the following summary: There are altogether in this country fifty-six different Lutheran Synods, separated from each other by geographical, doctrinal, or language lines. There are four larger organizations—namely, the Synodical Conference, with 935 pastors, 1,253 congregations, and 265,202 communicants, representing the extreme conservative side of the church; the General Synod North, with 849 pastors, 1,301 congregations and 129,164 communicants, representing the liberal branch; the General Council, with 721 pastors, 1,316 congregations and 205,806 communicants, occupying the middle ground, but daily becoming more and more conservative; and the General South, with 108 pastors, 187 congregations, and 14,336 communicants, inclining partly to the General Synod North and partly to the General Synod South. Besides these, there are thirteen synods in no official connection with other bodies, numbering 1,124 pastors, 201 parochial teachers, 2,261 congregations, and 261,724 communicants. The grand total for the whole Lutheran church, in America, is 3,736 pastors, 779 teachers, 6,302 congregations, and 773,382 communicants.

THE SECRET EMPIRE.

—Massachusetts has over 30,000 Odd-fellows, with an average of 175 to each lodge.

—The Indiana Odd-fellows have improvised a new test. Every applicant for initiation must be able to read and write before he is accepted.

—The anniversary of Odd-fellowship falls this year on the Sabbath. The Grand Sires and Grand Patriarchs have made proclamations that the day be observed in lodge style.

—Rev. Robert Lowry, the popular music composer. is said to be a member of the Phi Kappa Psi college secret society. He attended the Grand Arch Council of the order last month at Columbus, O. How can he reconcile this relation with the example of his Saviour?

—Seventeen Knight Templars of Mt. Vernon Commandery, Columbus, O., have been expelled because they belonged to the Egyptian or some rite other than the Ancient and Accepted Scottish. The Masonic Home Journal declares the action an outrage. On the other hand the seventeen expelled members may be congratulated that they are out from such company.

—The Phi Kappa Psi college secret fraternity was founded by W. H. Letterman and Charles P. T. Moore at Jefferson College, Pennsylvania, in 1852. The chapters now number thirty-five, located in the principal colleges of the United States. Since its organization the fraternity has been governed, in the interim of the Grand Arch Council, by a grand chapter, which is chosen at each session of the G. A. C. from one of the sub-chapters.

— A writer in the Voice of Masonry in examining after the origin of Masonry says that it was once specially "Egyptian in its character; that subsequently it was purified by Solomon, perhaps, and by him consecrated to the noblest purposes; that becoming then the heritage of the Israelites it assumed its undoubted Hebraic character; that it has been largely modified by successive generations and nations; that in the lapse of ages it became, under the providence of God, the inheritance of the Anglo-Saxon race."

—There are in Great Britain 227,655 Freemasons; of these England and Wales and the dependencies muster 140,000, Scotland 69,256 and Ireland 18,400. There are in Europe 340,000 Freemasons in all and in North and South America about 650,000, and in India and China probably about ten thousand, making a total of a little over a million. It is possible that we may add to that number another ten thousand for Cuba and Liberia and Australasia.—London Freemason.

—The Rt. Rev. William Stevens Perry, Bishop of Iowa in the Protestant Episcopal church, says the Inter Ocean, was made a Mason in Philadelphia Feb. 14. Among the other bishops of the Protestant Episcopal church who have been Masons have been named the Rt. Rev. Samuel Seabury, D. D., the first Episcopal Bishop of America, of the diocese of Connecticut; the Rt. Rev. Edward Bass, D. D., the first bishop of Massachusetts; the Rt. Rev. Wm. Odenheimer, D. D., Bishop of New Jersey; the Rt. Rev. Thos. U. Dudley, D. D. Bishop of Kentucky, with Bishops Griswold, Chase, Bedell, Schereschewsky, Randall, Pinckney and Spaulding, and the present Lord Bishop of Peterboro, Eng.

— The New York Dispatch tells of a case lately tried before a magistrate in that State, in which a witness refused to divulge from whom he received his information, stating that he received it Masonically, or on the square, and on being threatened with imprisonment for contempt, stated: "With all respect to the court, this is a matter that I received under solemn pledges to keep secret. I can go to the jail, or to the gallows if required, but I cannot violate my word of honor." The examining attorney did not press the question, and the judge took this contempt of his court with the stupidity of a coward. The Detroit Freemason quotes the incident with approbation, saying, "This is the kind of Mason we like." That is, the Mason who keeps his lodge oath and breaks that to the State is to be honored.

Banquet of R. A.—Rev. Mr. Durston, of the "Central City Council" of this world-famed "Royal Arcanum" was brought forward to "sneeze" for the edification of the gormandizing and hilarious craft. Of this marvelous episode the Syracuse Daily Journal of Feb 25 taxes its eloquence to say: "Rev. A. S. Durston, of Central City Council, was the next speaker. He spoke of the organization, of the friendly feeling existing, and by request gave a selection entitled, "The Sneezing Man," which, during its rendering, called forth much laughter." Now, this Rev. Arcanumite sneezer is secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association of Syracuse, and we have been told that from personal confession he revels in the multiform swearings of some seven different, and distinct secret societies. Now, any man who possesses the capacity to entertain such a multiform and conglomerate consummation of secretism is not to be "sneezed at," he he layman or divine. Now, we mean this for a very eloquent and sonorous eulogium on this right royal secret somethingness. We have intentionally used some big words, for it is a big subject.—Wesleyan.

OBITUARY.

Carrie S. Kellogg, second daughter of the assistant editor of Cynosure, died March 2d, after a week's severe illness, aged seven years and five months. A child of thoughtful yet winning temperament that promised to develop into a beautiful and loving character, the hearts of her parents are soothed for her loss by the frequent expressions, during the last two days of her life, of her simple and beautiful trust in her Saviour. The thought of going to be with Jesus seemed to be as natural as her breath; and she several times asked that passages be read where the Bible tells of Jesus healing sick people and blessing little children.

GUIZOT'S HISTORY OF FRANCE.

With 426 Fine illustrations, Eight beautiful volumes, small octavo, cloth, gilt tops. Price reduced from $49.50 to $8.00, postage $1.20.

THE BEST.

"This is the only complete American edition of this work, which is known as the best popular history of France."—Journal, Indianapolis, Ind.

MACAULAY'S Peer

"Guizot is the Macaulay of the history of France. His narrative is full of emotion, like a quick stream; his characters rise before us as in the flesh; they are men and women, not historic lay figures. It is as charming as any romance. There is only one draw-back . . . it seems more like getting a present than making a purchase."—Dominion Churchman, Toronto.

CIPHERED OVER.

"From the pen of a master. How Mr. Alden can give the eight volumes, and this on good paper, and clear type, including the multitude of illustrations, is a thing we have ciphered over, but we fail to understand it."—Christian Leader, Boston.

HOME HINTS.

A flannel cloth dipped into warm soapsuds and then into whiting and applied to paint will remove grease and dirt. Wash with clean water and dry. The most delicate paint will not be injured and will look like new.

A very pretty and easily made lap-robe for a small child's sleigh is made of a square of honey-comb flannel. Put a border round this of split or single zephyr, about one finger deep, and crochet a handsome scallop on the edge. The entire border is to be crocheted, of course.

The objection is sometimes raised that made-over stockings hurt the tender feet of children. But if they are made as they should be, there is no danger of that. The edges should be darned together smoothly and not sewed in a seam. To see just how to do this observe how the stockings are joined in the back.

Kerosene is becoming known as a valuable insecticide. Prof. A. J. Cook uses this mixture: One pint of kerosene, one quart of soft soap, one gallon of water. The soap and water are heated to boiling, when the kerosene is added and all well stirred, This prevents attacks of borers in fruit trees, kills all the lice on plants, and has been found effectual against many inseet pests. With whale-oil soap in the mixture, it has destroyed the cabbage maggot.

To prevent condensation in stove pipes the chimney must be higher than the roofs of surrounding buildings. The stove pipe must be as short and direct as possible, ascend in all its length and have the joints inverted. All openings in the flue below should be closed; or if they are in use and cannot be closed, then place the pipe in the flue, having the upper part cut off, so the smoke will be conducted into the chimney, and in escaping from the pipe have none of the upper part of the pipe to hit against.

Mix silicate of potash or soluble glass with ashes and apply to cracks in stoves. This cement will stick to red-hot iron and bricks without crumbling off but will not bear moisture. If holes are to be stopped in hard-finished walls, mix the silicate with whiting; if in holes in grates, mix with fire clay. Soluble glass sells at drug stores for one dollar a gallon.

Hot milk is recommended as a restorative, and as exerting a most beneficial influence over mind and body when exhausted by labor or mental strain. Its effects are more invigorating and enduring than those of alcoholic stimulants.

A PAPIER MACHE FLOOR COVERING.

A new papier mache process for covering floors is deseribed as follows: The floor is thoroughly cleaned. The holes and cracks are then filled with paper putty, made by soaking newspaper in a paste made of wheat flour, water and ground alum, as follows: To one pound of flour add three quarts of water and a tablespoonful of ground alum, and mix this thoroughly. The floor is then coated with this paste, and a thickness of manila or hardware paper is next put on. If two layers are desired, a second covering of manila is put on. This is allowed to dry thoroughly. The manila paper is then covered with paste, and a layer of wall-paper of any style or design desired is put on. After allowing this to thoroughly dry, it is covered with two or more coats of sizing, made by dissolving one-half pound of white glue in two quarts of hot water. After this is dry, the surface is given one coat of "hard oil-finish varnish." This is all allowed to dry thoroughly, when the floor is ready for use. The preparation is durable and cheap, and besides taking the place of matting, carpet, oil-cloths, etc., a floor thus treated is rendered airtight, and can be washed or scrubbed.

THE BEREA EVANGELIST
—AIMS TO ADVOCATE—
CHRISTIANITY
—AND TO—
HELP BREAK DOWN EVERYTHING THAT HINDERS ITS SPREAD.

——)oo(——

It teaches that men need to be converted to a person—the personal Christ—and not simply to a system of truth; and that there must be implanted in them a divine life, as well as a correct belief.

The Evangelist seeks to show that the division of Christians into parties—denominations, seets—is a great wrong, and a very serious obstacle to the advancement of the Redeemer's Kingdom, and it seeks to show Christians and Christian churches how they may be one in Christ, in "the Apostles' fellowship," and to persuade and help them thus to unite.

The Evangelist also opposes Intemperance, Secret Societies, Worldliness, and the spirit of Caste, and aims to "war a good warfare" against all wrong.

In thus opposing evil, the Evangelist carefully endeavors to avoid harsh speaking, believing that it is as much duty to speak truth kindly as it is to speak it at all.

Published twice a month. Only 50 cents a year.

"A WEEKLY SHOWER OF REFRESHING."

Such is the language of a minister in writing of the

OF
New York.

—)o-o(—

Read some of the many high opinions of the Christian Nation expressed by people and papers:

The True Radical Ring.

I like your paper. It has the true radical ring, and is growing better every week.
(Rev.) T. C. Sproull.

A Weekly Treat.

I have enjoyed a weekly treat, as the Christian Nation is just to my taste. I like the fearless stand that it has taken for Prohibition. H. M. Pollock.

Par Excellence.

Allow me to congratulate you on the appearance and make-up of your paper. The matter is very good, and in fact the whole is par excellence. I hope you may receive many thousands of subscribers. S. O. Lowry.

In the Front Rank.

I congratulate you most heartily upon the success which has thus far attended your enterprise, and wish you the largest measure of success in the future. This undoubtedly you will have, and simply because of the merits of your paper, which already holds its place among our best religious Journals, and has put itself abreast of the advanced movements in journalism. (Rev.) J. F. Carson.

Hold the Fort for Prohibition.

I am very much pleased with your paper. It is not a yearling, but I hope that it may be, like England's queen of old, hale and hearty at sixty—that it may live to see this nation a Christian Nation indeed and in truth. Hold the fort for Prohibition! Some of us have had to pass through the fire of persecution because we dared to vote our sentiments on that question, and your paper has been a weekly shower of refreshing to us. May it prove a blessing in this, and be a great power in the work of overturning the greatest evil that ever cursed our nation, and which does more than any other agent in hindering us from becoming a Christian Nation. (Rev.) A. H. Orr.

Able Corps of Writers and Contributors.

Sacramento, Cal., Daily Record-Union.—A new paper entitled the Christian Nation has been started at New York, under the conductorship of John W. Pritchard, and with an able corps of writers and contributors.

Deserves a Noble Support.

Christian Cynosure, Chicago.—Among recently started Journals we have forborne to speak heretofore of the Christian Nation of New York, a weekly of beautiful proportions and able management lately begun by John W. Pritchard.... Thus ably manned the Christian Nation is a worthy addition to the ranks of journalism, and deserves a noble support.

Fast Making its Way.

The National Republican, Washington, D. C.—Mr. Joseph Bowes, the leader of the Sabbath-school teachers' class at the Y. M. C. A. rooms, this city, is the writer of an article on the "International Sunday-school Lesson," which appears each week in the Christian Nation, a journal published in New York. This journal is fast making its way into the hands of the Sunday-school teachers of the country on account of the superior and exceedingly helpful character of its articles on the Sunday-school lesson.

IN THE COILS;
—OR—
The Coming Conflict.

A NEW AND STRANGE STORY BASED ON STARTLING FACTS, VIVIDLY PORTRAYING A MYSTERIOUS AND DANGEROUS POWER AT WORK IN THE GOVERNMENT, THE CHURCH, AND THE HOME.

"All will agree that this is a powerfully written story."—Evangelist, (Chicago, Ills.)

"A book which we trust may have a wide circulation."—National Baptist, (Philadelphia.)

"So intensely interesting did I find it that it was hard to pause until the last sentence was read. This work places the author high among the writers of fiction."—W. W. Barr, D. D. in Christian Instructor, (Philadelphia.)

"Unless we are greatly mistaken, the work will do more to awaken the American church and people to the evils of Freemasonry than any other book recently published."—Evangelical Repository.

'The book will create a sensation in Masonic circles, and evoke criticism of a most relentless character. The courage of the author in attacking such a rock-rooted bulwark as Freemasonry is something to admire, Fanatic though he be."—Nebraska Watchman.

"Light is needed on this subject and needed badly, and we welcome this contribution to the literature of anti-secretism, and cordially commend it to the favorable attention of our readers."—United Presbyterian, (Pittsburgh.)

'A charming work, fit to be classed with 'Uncle Tom's Cabin,' it is indeed less a work of fiction. The volume is as valuable as a work of reference as it is agreeable, truthful and useful. Our young folks will not leave the book, if they begin it, till they 'see how it turns out.' "—Cynosure, (Chicago, Ills.)

There is in the United States an army regularly uniformed, divided into companies, regiments and brigades, with regular drill and completely officered. This army is chartered by the legislatures of the States, yet is answerable to none of them. It is larger than the regular army of the United States, already having 316 divisions, all under obedience to one head center. The American citizen who cannot see a fateful menace to American institutions in this army called Knights of Pythias, and in the other secret armies of drilled Freemasons, Odd-fellows, Patriarchal Circle, etc., is one of the blindest of men.

We shall shed few tears for the session of Congress that expired March 4th. One of the last and characteristic acts was the rejection by the House committee of the Senate bill for a Commission of Inquiry into the alcoholic liquor traffic. The committee probably feared it should never again have the opportunity of addressing the nation in favor of intemperance and so went out of its way to pronounce prohibition a failure and argue foolishly about personal habits and private conduct, as if the dinner tables of the Congressmen were about to be overturned. The fact is, and the liquor devotees are well aware of it, that a fair examination of the facts would result in a demand for prohibition from every point of reason, religion and national economy. It is the fact that such men fear, as all that love darkness hate the light.

Belgium has not, during the present century at least, been regarded as a government to be foremost in those efforts for wholesome morality in national life which are recognized as allying a people to their God. But her king was the first to attempt that grand movement which the congress of nations just closed at Berlin has acknowledged for the peaceful settlement and development of the new African world; and later he has set to the ostensibly Christian nations the noble example of recognizing the Lord's day by ordering all government, railway, post, and most telegraph offices to be closed on Sabbath afternoon. A good thing has again come out of Nazareth.

The new administration is beginning to "keep the word of promise to our ear:" may it not now "break it to our hope." The Treasury department has discharged some thirty-six special agents and inspectors in the customs department, who, it is said, held office not because because they were needed but to pay off political debts. The Interior department has sold the horses and carriages which have for sometime been a kind of regal appendage, and will assay the democratic plan of going afoot These are but straws. The wind blows well but who can tell when it will change? The army of office-seekers in Washington is reported as one of the biggest and most persistent. Will they change the wholesome drift of the administration?

The threat of war between England and Russia about the Afganistan boundary is nearly blown over. There is in the first place too slight a pretext for England to destroy the record of the present administration, much as Russia may desire a little revenge for the interference of Beaconsfield and the Jingoes after the Turkish war. The boundary will be probably settled quietly in a few days, but there may be trouble lurking in the bosom of the Slav, or military party, which is now foremost in the council of the Czar, and is said to be intriguing to inflame his ambition and excite his revenge. The Czar himself is credited with saying the other day: "I cannot conceive that any but the wildest dreamer could think I would declare war against England. Our ends can be attained, and will be attained, but it will be by the gradual power of civilization and not by force."

In one of the late Boston Monday lectures Joseph Cook gave the question, "Ought lotteries to be legalized, even for the benefit of the Grand Army of the Republic?" the following intrepid answer, which confirms a late note in these columns: "A thousand times, no! [Applause.] I have lately been in New Orleans, and studied there the operations of the famous Louisiana lottery. It is injurious in the extreme, not only in tempting many poor, thoughtless people to squander their hard earnings, but also in its indirect influence in municipal and State politics. If anybody wishes to know why we should not allow the first root of this mischief to sink into our soil, let him go to the Gulf and see what the whole upas tree is."

Beginning with Switzerland the nations of Europe are all expelling the dynamite fiends. A great sensation came upon Paris last week when the Fenian plotters were arrested and expelled from the country. If these men will take pains to prove themselves the universal enemies of the race, they can expect nothing else than to be outcasts and hated of all men. Expulsion will not cure their disease, however. Wherever they can find a strip of earth to receive them they will set up their lodges and renew their plotting with more fiendishness than ever.

It is a rare and thrilling exprience to read such words of stern rebuke and manful truth as the Christia Instructor quotes from a late sermon by Rev. R. N. Hammond of Clinton, Mass., thus: "There is something of moral grandeur in the man who rebukes wrong and corruption in every form and wherever found, without fear of consequences. It is most fitting that the voice of a John the Baptist should cry aloud in the moral wilderness of this age and demand with dauntless bravery repentance and reform from priest and people. The religious state of the Christian church to-day is little better than the decaying Judaism of the time of John. Men are attempting to put life and show into a religion of meaningless mummery and platitudes, and to retain in their homes and in the church the empty forms of long dead creeds and systems of belief as the Egyptians used to do their mummies; hence we see so many churches fail, or doctoring themselves as a physician does a sick man; but the disease is consumption—and all the fairs and church amusements instituted cannot keep them from dying. Form must give place to the living power of godliness."

THE GOSPEL IN ASIA.

ALA BAZAAR, Turkey, Feb. 13, 1885.

The death of Monsignor Nerses, the Armenian Patriarch of Constantinople, is a serious loss to the Armenian people. They had some faint hope of gaining a measure of reform from the Porte through his efforts. He was the most enlightened of all the patriarchs. He spoke most favorably of the Evangelical Armenians, and tried to establish friendship between the two communities. But he lacked the moral power of a leader to make reforms. He could have been the John Knox of the Armenians, had he the strong faith, the heroic firmness of that reformer, and a strong constitution. Still he did something to prepare the way and the old conservatism is beginning to yield.

I remember very well the state of things some thirty-five years ago when my father died as a Protestant. The Patriarch of that day had issued an edict by which the Protestants were excommunicated and in some respects they were outlawed. The cemetery was guarded and instructions were given by the Bishop not to allow the body of my father to be interred, so that it was buried in a small piece of ground. Now, a great change has taken place. A few months ago I was invited to rise and speak in the old church at a funeral. The priests instead of becoming angry came, when I had finished and thanked me, and I thanked God and took courage.

During the past year $470 have been contributed by this church to congregational and other benevolent purposes. In 1884 I have preached eighty sermons, have made two hundred and five pastoral calls, received nine members into fellowship of the church. We had seventy pupils in our school, seventy Bibles and two hundred and forty-six New Testaments, and portions of the Holy Scriptures were sold by the colporteurs of the Bible Society.

The week of prayer was observed here according to the programme. The topics of each day were first read and then prayers, hymns and remarks followed. The meetings were remarkably well attended and we were much refreshed.

In our young women's weekly meetings twelve women during the past year, have read written address prepared by themselves on various subjects, such as, What is woman? On conscience, etc. We have a few voluntary female workers, who visit the homes of the people speaking a word of comfort. Our elders or deacons have their regular visitations. It is good to be able to write hopefully regarding these things. But at the same time, while we rejoice over the influences for good, it is a fact which we can not but mourn over, that much of the good is lost in consequence of social and home evil influences—of the lack of parental restraint and instruction. Outside of the church there are everywhere gambling, raki drinking (a sort of whiskey) and social harmful customs. In the evangelical churches, the spirit of coldness and lukewarmness in religion to a greater or less extent, seems to pervade all the churches of the land. Those of our young men who are in this condition will not be constant in their attendance; by and by their visits to the house of God will be changed into visits to worldly friends and they will become shy of our society. I have known several to thus disappear from the church, and fall away from the paths of virtue. Alas! I feel as if an arrow was in my heart when I meet such an one. But I am glad to say these are few. Lately one of these backsliders has been penitent. A few weeks ago he wrote to the church session and his confession and contrition, shame and sorrow, for his backsliding from the Lord affected us all. Let me mention also, that besides those who are studying, we have a number of earnest young men doing the important detail work of tract distributions, of attractive singing at the meetings and social gatherings.

ALEXANDER DJFJIZIAN.

THE DISCIPLINE OF GOOD TEMPLARISM.

BY REV. J. D. GEHRING.

In my last letter I pointed out a few inconsistencies of Good Templarism, and gave evidence in proof that they, habitually and systematically, violate their "obligation" and the "motto" which they have stolen from God's Holy Book.

I might now close the case for the present, but I have something more to say about that "motto" of theirs. The subject is an important one, for, if I can show that they ignore and violate the plainest principle of "charity," I can also show that they lie when they claim to practice and apply "faith" and "hope" in the true sense.

Let us, then, briefly discuss the lodge discipline of Good Templarism:

The exercise of discipline presupposes the exercise of "charity" (or love). If we would make discipline effective, reformatory, we must begin, execute and end it in the spirit of charity. Now we know that this is often overlooked and neglected by ecclesiastical courts; and I shall prove that the lodge never does, and never can, allow love to decide or settle a case of discipline.

The Gospel rule is: If thy brother offend against thee, go to him and tell him of his fault, etc. Now, suppose one member of the lodge says or does something which offends another member, thus committing an offence against the rules of the lodge. The offended member goes straightway to the lodge with the grievance, and brings in a charge for violation of the "obligation." According to the law of the order, governing such cases, the charge is referred to a committee of three, which the "W. C. T." appoints, "concealing the name of the accuser." (Good Templar "charity," you see, would demand the concealment of the name of one who violated the rule of Bible charity.) The offender is summoned by this committee to appear for trial, and the case is heard. It is plain—to my mind at least—that the complaining member is equally guilty with the accused for having violated the spirit of the Good Templar motto by neglecting to try the virtue of brotherly love before bringing an accusation. Now if Good Templars will not insist upon the duty, demanded by the "jewel" of their motto, of showing forth the fruits of love in all cases requiring disciplinary action, let them be decently consistent and discard the "motto" altogether.

Another thing is worthy of mention in this connection. To be excluded from heaven is the greatest punishment which Divine Justice can inflict upon the sinner. To be expelled from one's country is the severest political punishment, next to death, which a government can inflict upon a subject. To be expelled from the church is, by common consent, always regarded as the very ultimatum of ecclesiastical discipline. The church can devise and exercise no disciplinary measure beyond that.

Now how is expulsion from the lodge regarded by Good Templars? According to every known principle governing the exercise of this extreme discipline, expulsion is inflicted only for equivalent offences in all reformatory institutions, and then only when unrepented of and persisted in. Good Templarism, however, insists upon the right to expel its members for the most trivial offences, and refuses to regard any confession, evidence of contrition, or promise of amendment on the part of the one charged with violation of a Good Templar's "obligation."

In some cases, indeed, "re-obligation" is substituted for expulsion, but the bread is no better than the dough, for they call that "a punishment." "Re-obligation," if it means anything at all, presupposes expulsion. The "obligation" is regarded by Good Templars as the crowning point of their ceremony of initiation. The candidate is not, and cannot be, a Good Templar until after the "obligation" is administered "in due form." If, then, the "obligation" creates a Good Templar, how can a Good Templar, not having been expelled, be "obligated" at all? Viewing the matter in this light, it must be granted that re-obligation is the infliction of the severest penalty known to the order, because it is the substitute of, and equivalent for, expulsion. Moreover, it is a fact which Good Templars cannot disprove that this severe punishment is often administered under circumstances and for offences which, necessarily, leaves "charity" entirely out of sight and thought. The offence may be committed against a special decision of the Grand Lodge, the existence of such a decision being unknown to even the most intelligent and faithful of the members of a subordinate lodge. In such a case the officers of the lodge are really responsible and guilty, because it is their duty to instruct the members, and especially the initiate. Both justice and love would demand that the lodge, through its officers, should guard the least and the greatest of its members against the danger of falling into one of the numerous traps set by the Grand Lodge, and called, "Decisions rendered by the Grand Lodge." I call these decisions "traps" because candidates, when initiated, are left in ignorance of them and are given to understand that the "Pledge," as contained in section 1, Art. II., of the "Constitution," is all there is of a Good Templars' obligation. That there are on record numerous decisions by the Grand Lodge, explaining, defining, limiting, qualifying, and otherwise tampering with the so-called "Pledge" is not once hinted at. Such is Good Templar charity. The Lord deliver us from such friends!

It is but just to add to what has been said above, that not all of the decisions of the Grand Lodge are of equal authority and force with the text of the "Pledge;" but my charge is abundantly sustained if I designate those decisions as belonging to this class which are expressly named, "Violations of the Pledge."

One of these decisions—already quoted in a former letter—reads as follows: "It is a violation of our obligations to drink, use or sell, sweet cider." In another place we find another decision, rendered by the Grand Lodge, which reads as follows: "A lodge forfeits its charter if it passes a resolution that no action be taken in cases of drinking sweet cider." Now, this decision shows that it was called forth by the refusal of some subordinate lodge to take action in a case of "drinking sweet cider." That refusal is evidence that Good Templars are not a unit as to the question, What constitutes a pledge violation? The Pledge itself says that the use, "as a beverage," of "cider" is forbidden. But some Good Templar insists that he can drink "sweet cider" without violating his pledge, because, he says, the cider mentioned and intended in the pledge refers to the cider of commerce—the article in common use when the order of Good Templars was first organized. It was the usual beverage in those days. Everybody drank it, and frequently a good, convivial old Templar would drink too much and make himself conspicuous. Hence, when they met in Grand Lodge council they concluded to add "cider" to the list of forbidden beverages; for it is claimed by good authority that the original pledge did not include cider. Thus, we will suppose, the sweet cider advocate argues when under charge of having violated his pledge. His opinion is shared and defended by a strong minority of the lodge, but the majority proceed to expel, and now the "outcast" seeks redress and justice before the Grand Lodge. It is plainly evident that the appellant drank nothing but the freshly expressed apple-juice, and that not as an habitual beverage, but only on a special occasion; and that when he did this he was not aware that the Grand Lodge had decided that unfermented apple-juice was cider, within the meaning of the "Pledge," and that the drinking of no more than a sip constituted a violation.

In another, similar, case the majority of the lodge pass a resolution to take no action, on the ground that the drinking of sweet apple-juice is no violation of the pledge. The minority oppose this resolution and appeal to the Grand Lodge, which renders the decision above last quoted.

To show to what a frivolous extent this sweet cider notion can lead sensible men and women, I shall mention a circumstance in the particulars of which the narrator himself took a leading part.

A minister of the M. E. church, at the time of my own cider experience, located in West Bend, Wis., told me that he was at one time W. C. T. of a lodge when the very same question about sweet cider came up in a case of discipline. Some young girls, he said, being together as a visiting party, had taken some apples and, pounding them up, had pressed out the juice "by hand," and then all had taken a drink. The matter came before the lodge, and it was there declared to be a violation of the pledge. The culprits, however, having confessed their guilt, and pleaded ignorance in their own defence, he, as Worthy Chief, had to re-obligate them all!

He, being a good friend and a ministerial brother, thought he owed me this illustration in order to convince me that the lodge had served me right, as I refused to be re-obligated.

But enough has been said to prove that Good Templarism, like all other organized despotisms of secrecy, deals in trifles and foolish child's play, at the same time trampling under foot truth, justice and charity.

Parkville, Mo.

During the recent festival the Shoshone Indians occupied three days and nights in dancing. All savages and some civilized people waste a great deal of time in dancing. It will be observed that as we descend in the social and intellectual scale the rage for dancing increases. In the lowest grade of civilized society, the "dance house" is almost the sole resort of merry makers, and dancing and fighting are the only amusements of the dwellers in the slums. As a rule, a ball without a fight is as great a rarity as pienic without a pie. Among the savages dancing is a universal and natural art, every barbarian knows how to dance, without any instruction. We have some other things to say about dancing, meaner and hatefuller than anything in this paragraph, but we hold them in reserve to fire at some indignant man with brains in his heels who will be indiscreet enough to reply to this pleasant and interesting statement of fact.—Burlington Hawkeye.
